The authorities have called up to the army all those who accepted Ottoman citizenship at the beginning of the war. Exemption was granted to the teachers of the Jewish gymnasium, to the pupils of the Bezalel school, and to those able and willing to pay a sum of 1,000 francs. A few only were in a position to do so. The work in the colonies has suffered greatly from the call up, which resulted in a shortage of labor.

JUSTICE FOR JEWS IN MOROCCO.

Thanks to the efforts of M. N. Slousch, the French President-General in Morocco has decided to reorganize the local courts of justice, which are now in the hands of Arabs, and who, as a rule, deal unjustly with Jews who appear before them.

PRAISE FOR THE B'NAI B'RITH FROM A NON-JEW.

During the recent campaign for members conducted under the auspices of Cincinnati Lodge, one of the circulars soliciting affiliation with the Order erroneously was addressed to a non-Jew. To this appeal the following reply was received:

Hon. Alfred M. Cohen, Chairman Membership Campaign Committee, Cincinnati Lodge, No. 4, I. O. B. B.:

Dear Sir: Your circular letter with application blank for membership in Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, of your very worthy Order, I. O. B. B., reached me at a time I was bedfast at my home in consequence of an automobile accident, and for this reason a reply which should have received more timely attention was delayed unavoidably. The address you gave same was absolutely correct, yet evidently it was intended for another bearing same name as my own. Let me state that I am not one of your coreligionists but, irrespective of all that, and be that as it may, I am, and have been for many years, well aware of the doings of your noble Order, an Order with so many beautiful sentiments, aims and, in fact, noble in its character and fully so in its deeds. Not being eligible for membership in the Order B'nai B'rith does not prevent me being one of you, both heart and soul, all the same, for your Order at all times stands for and has been at work in a cause most noble and worthy. May I ask you kindly to favor me in accepting inclosed check and may it benefit some of those little orphans, a large number of whom are continually under the care and guidance of your worthy Order?

Very respectfully yours,
HERMAN KIRSCHNER.
673 N. Crescent Ave., Cincinnati.

The letter was suitably acknowledged by Mr. Cohen and the money applied for the use of the Cleveland Orphan Asylum.

CLEVELAND LODGE OF THE I. O. B. B.

To the Memory of Martin A. Marks.

Cleveland Lodge of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, in meeting assembled, records its loss sustained by the death of Martin A. Marks. During the many years of his membership and the changes of his eventful life, his loyalty remained unchanged, and notwithstanding his business career, he was never too busy to serve the lodge. His attitude was a most impressive argument, his example a most valuable asset.

His logical mind saw the need of organized effort to counteract the influences which needlessly divide a people and perpetuate misunderstanding. To him the lodge was a unifying agent, emphasizing the points all Jews hold in common, reducing the barriers which keep them apart. He was especially interested in the aim to bring together and hold steadfast the Jewish young men of Cleveland—to stimulate and conserve their Jewish consciousness.

These were the aims and belief of Martin A. Marks; but more noteworthy than his belief is the record of his service. Every member has heard the injunction, "Be thou a blessing", but to some it comes like an inspiration, energizing the best within them for service to their fellowmen. High on the roll of this class is the name of Martin A. Marks. His clear judgment and constructive ability, his broad sympathy and influential position, brought his service in frequent demand and made him a familiar figure in the welfare movements of the order and of the community.

His career is a lesson on useful living—a lesson best understood when the career is closed and memory brings back the years spent in communal service. Here is the aim which gave distinction to the work and name of Martin A. Marks. His exemplary usefulness remains among the members as a stimulant for service to causes broader than their own.

These are the thoughts we would offer with tender sympathy to the bereaved family. Passing days will lose their loneliness and grief, its sting in the contemplation of a life so highly endowed and so highly purposed.

The Joint Distribution Committee has distributed a matrix containing photographs of 28 men and women who are called the pioneers in the raising of funds for the relief of Jews suffering through the war. Whether by inadvertence or design, the photograph of Mr. Adolf Kraus, president of the Order, is not included, although the B'nai B'rith was the first in the field to gather funds for the suffering Jews in the war zones and forwarded moneys to belligerent countries months before other organizations joined in a movement to raise funds for the same cause.

Presentation of B'nai B'rith Gold Medal to Hon. Henry Morgenthau

Perhaps one of the most brilliant functions in the history of B'nai B'rith activities occurred at New Haven, Monday evening, Dec. 18. The occasion was a presentation to Bro. Henry Morgenthau of New York, ex-ambassador of United States to Turkey, of the medal awarded annually by the Independent Order B'nai B'rith to the man who performs the greatest service to Judaism. This presentation took place at a banquet given by Horeb Lodge of New Haven at the Hotel Taft in honor of the occasion. Preceding the banquet a private reception was tendered to the guests by Col. Isaac M. Ullman, at his handsome residence. In honor of Mr. Henry Morgenthau there were gathered at this private reception personages of note, prominent among whom were ex-President William H. Taft, ex-Governor of the State of Connecticut Simeon E. Baldwin, President Hadley of Yale University, Lieutenant Governor of Connecticut Clifford B. Wilson; Charles Hartman, Executive Committee member of District No. 1; Judge Isaac Wolfe, Honorable Abraham K. Cohen, President of District No. 1 Joseph H. Ullman, Col. Isaac M. Ullman, Col. Harry Cutler of Providence, Rhode Island; Henry Morgenthau, Jr., son of the ambassador, Acting Mayor of New Haven; Hon. Samuel Campner, Maurice P. Davidson, Second Vice-President of District No. 1 Henry Lasker of Springfield, Charles H. Shapiro of Bridgeport, Benjamin B. Lubinsky, President of Horeb Lodge.

After the private reception the guests repaired to the Hotel Taft, where there was a public reception, when Mr. Henry Morgenthau was formally presented to and shook hands with the hundreds of enthusiastic members who attended the banquet. Then followed the banquet in the grand ball-room of the Hotel Taft.

Col. Isaac M. Ullman, to whose splendid efforts, jointly with Joseph H. Ullman and Horeb Lodge, the success of the affair was due, presided as toastmaster, and the eloquent, apt and witty manner in which he introduced the speakers aroused the diners to great applause. In fact, the entire affair was in the best style of Horeb Lodge, and the Order should feel proud of the splendid manifestations of enthusiasm and efficiency which the occasion developed. A noteworthy fact which was dwelt upon and which caused great joy was that Horeb Lodge has just passed a membership of 700. Indeed, it was most fitting that the banner lodge of District No. 1 should be the vehicle for the presentation of the gold medal.

The speakers were in their best vein. Charles Hartman, executive member of District No. 1, who presented the medal to ex-Ambassador Morgenthau, delivered a noteworthy address, in the course of which he explained the significance of the medal, pointing out that medals had already been awarded in two instances, to-wit, to President Taft, while he occupied the White House, and to Mr. Stern, President of the District Grand Lodge in Roumania. In dignified and eloquent periods Mr. Hartman dwelt upon the great services rendered by Mr. Morgenthau, not only to Judaism but also to humanity and to civilization while at his post in Constantinople. In accepting the medal and expressing his deep appreciation, Mr. Morgenthau delivered a most interesting talk on the conditions which he found in Palestine, Constantinople and Egypt. During his interesting narrative, Mr. Morgenthau told about his visits to the B'nai B'rith lodges in Constantinople and Egypt, and in Jerusalem. In the midst of the alarms of war and the terrible uncertainties in which they lived, the brethren in these lodges received Ambassador Morgenthau as a deliverer. His assurances of protection brought them happiness and comfort and it will never be forgotten, while burdened by the responsibilities and duties of his great position, Mr. Morgenthau found time to go into the lodges of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith and there extend the hand of protection and brotherhood.

The gathering stood and cheered when the toastmaster introduced ex-President William H. Taft as "the best loved citizen of New Haven."

Prof. Taft, who received the B'nai B'rith medal in 1914, spoke of Mr. Morgenthau's services to the Red Cross in Turkey, where that organization had no other official representative. He eulogized the work that naturalized citizens have done for this country, and expressed his sincere hope that the bar to immigration might never be put up, saying that oppressed people should have a chance to grow and fulfill their hopes.

Picturing the devastation of Europe and the manner in which men like the honored guest of the evening stood out under such conditions, Acting Mayor Campner eloquently portrayed his accomplishments and extended him the welcome of the city. Lieutenant Governor Clifford B. Wilson answered for the state, and said that achievement along humanitarian lines is the highest goal of human endeavor.

Judge A. K. Cohen of Boston, President of District No. 1, made a splendid speech and he undoubtedly expressed the wishes of all in his declaration that the great services of Mr. Morgenthau should be retained by the people of the country in some other great capacity, and that it would be fitting and proper if he should be selected as one of the peace commissioners to be sent by the United States upon the conlusion of hostilities.

President Hadley of Yale, who arrived quite late, was the last speaker of the evening. President Hadley pleaded for preparedness at the same time highly lauding Mr. Morgenthau.

It was an event of transcending interest to our Order and to all Americans. It evidenced the solidarity of our American citizenship, of whatever faith, in matters concerning the honor and welfare of our country. What made the occasion glorious was the knowledge that Bro. Henry Morgenthau, the recipient of the medal had advanced the cause of civilization and had enhanced the prestige of the United States by his humanitarian services.

The generous spirit of our Gentile friends who joined with us in tendering their thanks and appreciation of the services rendered by a great American Jew will never be forgotten. The event again emphasizes the fact that in this country of ours the door of opportunity is ajar for rich and poor, Jew and Gentile, and that here we have achieved not merely a haven of refuge, but a field of human equality, realizing our highest hopes. These are some of the lessons presented by the rise to power and high position of ex-Ambassador Henry Morgenthau. The keynote of this great ceremony of the presentation of the B'nai B'rith medal was service, and his record of service for Judaism and humanity should prove an incentive to every B'nai B'rith and constitutes a splendid exemplification of the cardinal principles of our Order.

Presentation Address of Mr. Hartman.

"Horeb Lodge is one of the lodges of District No. 1 to which we point with particular pride, as an example of what a lodge of the Order should be and do. It is alert, progressive and thorough in all that it undertakes. It does not stagnate, but is constantly adding to its strength and expanding in usefulness. It has made a splendid record of benefit to its members, and in promoting, in the community which it serves, philanthropic, educational and other altruistic works. It is a strong and successful lodge and may be counted upon to become a powerful factor in furthering and supporting the causes for which our Order stands.

"The present splendid gathering and the purpose for which Horeb Lodge has brought us together are evidence of its energy, zeal and effectiveness and of the appreciation by its members of high and meritorious service.

"As a member of the Executive Committee of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, I am here in performance of the duty with which I have been honored, to present the gold medal of the Order, for great service rendered in the Jewish cause, to our distinguished brother and colleague, the honored guest of the evening, Henry Morgenthau. It is fitting that the Independent Order B'nai B'rith should recognize and mark with its approval eminent services in behalf of Judaism or the Jewish people, as our Order is dedicated to such service, and has, at all times, come to the aid of the distressed and persecuted and has striven and will continue to strive with all its strength to secure justice and equal rights for our people wherever still denied to them. I may cite, as the most conspicuous of the Order's labors in this connection, the prolonged and strenuous efforts in behalf of our co-religionists in Roumania, the arousal of public sentiment in this country in consequence of the terrible massacres at Kishineff, resulting in a petition and protest, signed by thousands of our citizens of all creeds, communicated by our government to the Government of Russia, and the work done in co-operation with other organizations which led to the abrogation of the treaty of commerce between our country and Russia, because of the refusal of the latter to recognize passports issued by our government to its Jewish citizens.

"Animated by its zeal for the great cause to which its energies were so largely devoted, the Order, at its General Convention held in the City of Washington in the year 1910, decreed the award of a gold medal from time to time to the person, regardless of creed, rendering the greatest service to the cause of Judaism. The first medal was awarded in the year 1912 to one who had conspicuously served Judaism by his service in behalf of right and justice and who had thereby served humanity and advanced the cause of civilization one who endeared himself to his fellow-citizens, regardless of party, and who will ever be regarded with esteem and affection by the American people. I refer to William H. Taft, then President of the United States. The second medal was awarded in the year 1914 to Dr. Adolphe Stern, President of District Grand Lodge No. 9 of Bucharest, who had given many years of distinguished service in behalf of the Roumanian Jews. The third medal has been awarded to Henry Morgenthau in recognition of the eminent service rendered by him to all peoples and for Judaism while Ambassador of this country to Turkey. He served all who needed and merited his aid, whether in his official capacity or as an individual, regardless of creed. He threw himself with the utmost zeal into the work of relieving the terrible distress occasioned by the war. In Constantinople, in Palestine, which he visited, and throughout the Turkish dominions, he was the protector and saviour of thousands.

"The time allotted to me will not permit reference in detail to his work. By his ability, energy, firmness and self-sacrificing devotion he was enabled to rescue men, women and children. The work he did while Ambassador will form a notable record in the annals of American history and is today known and commended among all nations. Jew and Christian alike in Turkey will gratefully remember him. At a crucial time he served his country and his fellow-men with signal ability.

"Is it not strange, matter for serious reflection by statesmen and all other thoughtful persons, that in this highly developed and enlightened age there should still remain an urgent need to strive for the Jewish cause—for freedom from oppression and discriminatory laws? That millions of Jews, peaceful, law-abiding, intelligent and industrious citizens, should be denied the equal protection of the laws, should be persecuted and treated with the cruelties of mediaeval ignorance, superstition and barbarism? Does not this call for a searching of hearts, for an answer to the inquiry, why should such conditions be permitted to persist?

"Now, Brother Morgenthau, I deliever to you, on behalf of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, this medal as a token of our appreciation of the noble work you have done for our people; and let me, at the same time, express the hope, and in so doing I am sure I speak for our entire membership, that you may become an active, zealous worker, yes, leader, in our people's great cause, that your hands may be strengthened and your opportunities enlarged for further and greater service to our country and our people, and thereby to the cause of humanity."

Address of Mr. Morgenthau.

"I deem myself, indeed, a very fortunate man to have been selected by you for the distinction of sharing with our friend, ex-President Taft, and Dr. Adolph Stern, of Bucharest, the great honor of possessing the B'nai B'rith medal for services rendered to the Jewish cause.

"I never began to fully appreciate what it meant for the Jews to have in the United States received equal rights and equal opportunities with the rest of the community until I visited Egypt and Palestine and saw the condition of the Jews, who have lived there for thousands of years, and contrasted the two conditions. Our brethren that have remained there are still ignorant of the privileges and the joy resulting from liberty. Most of them still live a ghetto existence, that kind of life where we were prevented from publicly entering into any elevating pursuits or participating in the responsibilities of Government or leadership of the people. A comparison of conditions existing there and in this country reminded me of a seed that is planted in a cellar, deprived of sunlight and care, and the wonderful results that are obtained from the same kind of seed when planted in favorable soil.

"You can appreciate the satisfaction I felt in attending sessions of lodges of the Order in Constantinople, Jerusalem, Cairo and other cities of the Orient and seeing there the commencement of the same emancipation that has taken place in the United States and encouraging them with a recital of our condition in this country, telling them what great results have flown from our possessing the right to participate not only in every profession and trade, but also in the responsibilities of governing the country. You ought to have seen the uplifted faces of the members of those lodges, many of them sitting there with their red fezzes, as I described to them how we lived here and what wonderful changes had taken place in our people within such a short time. How their eyes sparkled when they realized the full meaning of the fact that one of their Order was in their midst, representing not only the greatest country of the world, but also eight other nations, and was enjoying the privilege of rendering financial assistance on behalf of those countries to all their destitute citizens. It seemed a sort of poetic justice that a Jew was entrusted by the Russian Government to look after its subjects in the Turkish Empire! I felt like a knight of old who had gone abroad to succor the still enthralled members of his race.

"I hesitate to accept thanks and such unusual signs of appreciation for having enjoyed such great privileges, because I feel that I ought to be the one that should thank for the exceptional privileges and opportunities that I had to comply with that ungratified desire to render services to my country and my people which worried me like an unpaid debt.

"You men who have succeeded in the various walks of life must not content yourself with merely accumulating material comforts. It is as much your duty to devote some of your time to the benefit of your fellow men as though you had entered into a written obligation to do so. The fact that no pledge is exacted from you does not relieve you of the moral responsibility to give quid pro quo for that great blessing of liberty and equal opportunity that this country has extended to all of us. Just as individuals employed by others rise quickest who give more and better service than what they are really being paid for, so we as a race will be appreciated more by our fellow citizens if we do more than our share in public service."

POLISH ANTI-SEMITIC MOVE.

The Polish Anti-Semites in Russia have endeavored to utilize the proclamation of the Polish kingdom by the enemy in order to bring upon our coreligionists the wrath of the Russian Jew-baiters, but failed in the attempt. They endeavored to describe the German step as a move to please the Jews. "The Jews alone will rejoice at the work of the enemy," proclaimed the Polish leader, Deputy Count Putkammer. The Russians, however, including the anti-Semites, declined to believe the allegation. failing to see the reason for such a charge.

The fiasco of the Polish anti-Semites became complete when a reliable message from Warsaw arrived announcing the abstention of the Jews from participation in the Polish-German celebration on the occasion of the proclamation of the kingdom and the anger of the Germans at their attitude.

Other messages from Warsaw speak of a sharp anti-Semitic campaign in the municipality in favor of the expulsion of the refugees in that city. Complaints are also being made in the Polish press that the Jews meet too often in conference for the purpose of organizing the capture of the trade, that they invade the villages, and that the Austrian Zionists help them. One agitator even urged that the Poles should purposely allow the commerce of Poland to decline in order to get rid of the Jews. A prosperous commercial Poland, he argued, would mean a Jewish influx.

THE NATIONAL JEWISH HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTIVES, DENVER, COLO.

Summing up the foregoing presentation it must be said that the National Jewish Hospital is a highly functionalized and well-administered organization for the performance of a very definite social service, namely, the care and treatment of patients suffering from tuberculosis. As a general plant, it ranks among the most modern and complete of the larger sanatoria of America. One sees planning in the general evolution of the institution —a result, doubtless in large measure, due to the fact that the executive management of the hospital has reposed in one superintendent from the day of its opening, 16 years ago, until the present time. Under the leadership of this administrator, the institution early assumed a leading place in the sanatorium field and has steadily maintained its position during these 15 years of rapid advance.—(Teller Report, page 85—June, 1916.)

THE KEHILLAH, XXIX

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

There is a profound saying in the Talmud (Sanhedrin, 98a), ascribed to a rabbi, who exclaimed, "May the Messiah come, but would that I should not live to see him come." As I understand this word, the rabbi meant to say, that the crisis that shall precede the advent of the millenium will be terrible for those who shall live at that time. Nehemiah Trebitsch and Samson Raphael Hirsch, the former the last representative of the old ideal and the latter the pioneer of the new, experienced the truth of this rabbinic wisdom. When Nehemiah Trebitsch died in 1842, at the age of sixty-two, he had known long before that his age was being superseded by one with entirely new ideas. In Prossnitz he was succeeded by Loew Schwab before he had entered upon his new office. The latter again, in 1836, while Trebitsch was still Landrabbiner, was succeeded by Hirsch Baer Fassel (1802-1883), a fiery champion of reform.. This idea of reform was not one that we would now call so. He was a sort of Muenchhausen, who tried to pull himself out of the marsh by his own pigtail. Fassel's idea was that there was no need for reform because one could have all the reform that was needed by those interpretations of the Schulchan Aruk, which we find in the works of the old casuists. It seems ridiculous now, but in his day Fassel was an advanced liberal. At any rate he recognized the need of revising the rigorous legalism of olden times. Still more important as proof that a new time had come, was the frequency of young men who went to university to make their studies. Such a young man was Zechariah Frankel (1801-1875, like Trebitsch, a native of Prague, who, when Trebitsch became Landrabbiner, was called to the important Kreisrabbinate of Teplitz, and while Trebitsch still held office, to the rabbinate of Dresden. He possessed the degree of doctor of philosophy from the University of Budapest, and had written important works in German on rabbinic law and Jewish history, which showed him to be a man of considerable rabbinic learning, who could take his place by the side of representatives of the old generation. Trebitsch must have felt, as the Talmud (Makkot, 10a), describes us King David, when the scoffers of Jerusalem would knock at his windows and say: "When are you going to die, old man, so that Solomon could be your successor and build for us the new Temple?" His position was that of a great general in the fifteenth century, who had reached middle life, when the invention of gunpowder changed the whole system of strategy.

It took five years before a successor was appointed. These are the throes of Messianic times. There were still plenty of representatives of the old rabbinate, men who spent their whole life in studying rabbinic literature, and whose greatest ideal was that of insisting on strict observance of the law. The small progressive element, which, however, by wealth and social position, was the most important one, demanded a man of modern culture. The larger element that stuck to the ideas of the past was grudgingly compelled to submit. A change in religious life, or in the mode of worship in the synagogue, was not in the remotest way thought of. The only deviation considered was with regard to secular culture The new Landrabbiner, if he was to command the respect of the growing youth and especially the respect of the authorities, was to be a man of secular education. Many have a false notion of the status of secular culture in this country in those days. All men of middle life at the time of the death of Nehemiah Trebitsch knew to read and to write German although there were, of course, some exceptions among the poorer classes. Not inconsiderable was already the number of those who went to the "Gymnasium" to receive a higher education. My father had a cousin, born in 1810 who must have entered the Gymnasium of Nikolsburg in the early twenties. A cousin of mine, born in 1823, who like the first named afterwards became a physician, also attended the Gymnasium there, and in 1883, when this Gymnasium celebrated its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary, there was some veterans born around 1800 who appeared at the reunion. It is true that the idea of a high school education for the sake of mere education was hardly thought of. All of those who entered the Gymnasium prepared themselves for a professional career, which almost invariably was that of a physician, because no other profession was open to a Jew. More important than the question of the number of such students was the undeniable fact that this movement was bound to grow. The congregation felt that it could not afford to have a rabbi who was looked down upon by the best intellectual element of his flock. One man, who was considered especially equipped for the task of showing that secular culture was to be harmonized with strict adherence to traditional religion, was Samson Raphael Hirsch. He was indeed a remarkable man, and while only four years of his public activity, which extends over almost sixty years, were spent in Nickolsburg, it is worth while to present the picture of this unique personality to modern American readers.

The fundamental principle, that contrast is the most important factor in historic development, is hardly more clearly shown in any case than in that of Hirsch. He was born in Hamburg in 1808, of a respectable, strictly orthodox family. His father was a business man of modest means, and his grandfather, Mendel Frankfurter, called so because his grandfather had come from Frankfort to Hamburg, was a superintendent of the Talmudtorah school and afterwards member of the rabbinate. Family names in those days were still in a flux. One of Mendel Frankfurter's sons called himself, for a reason unknown to me, Mendel Hirsch. Another son, known as a Hebrew writer of some merit, assumed the name of Moses Mendelsohn. A brother of Hirsch called himself Rapp, very likely by permission of the authorities. In 1818, when Hirsch was a child, the first reform temple ever organized was opened in Hamburg. This reform might be termed a radical one, although it is far from reaching the level of American ideas. The main thing, however, was that it abandoned the traditional ritual, shortened it considerably, and expunged from the prayerbook all references to the return to Palestine. This was indeed the main motive of the reform. Jews after the battle of Waterloo were engaged in the struggle of obtaining an improvement of their civic and political condition. One of the main points raised against the claim was the statement that they, through their prayers, declared themselves aliens, expecting to leave their country as soon as the Messiah would appear. This objection had to be met. There were, however, other reasons for reform, especially one based on aesthetic motives. The weird music of the synagogue, the monotony of the long prayers, were constantly brought forward by the enemies of the Jews as reasons for their opposition to giving the Jews political equality. It was the "Judenschul" which, in the opinion of the enemies, decided the case against the Jews. The law of history, referred to above, necessitated the rise of a conservative party. Where there is progress there must be conservatism, too. It is the brake on the wagon of history. The orthodox party of Hamburg saw that the members of the rabbinate, presenting the old type, could not stem the tide of progress, and so they resolved to call to their pulpit a man of modern education. Their choice fell upon Isaac Bernays (1793-1849), then a young man of twenty-eight, who had previously been tutor in the house of Baron Hirsch of Wuerzburg, the grandfather of the celebrated philanthropist. Bernays had made his studies in Munich, and undoubtedly had been influenced—though his admirers deny it—by the mystic philosophy of Schelling. At any rate, he was a decided mystic. The best proof is the statement of Heine about him, which by the way, Graetz (Geschichte, XI, 432), has mutilated in a manner, which from a historical point of view, cannot be sincere. Heine says, "I have heard Bernays, nobody understands him. He is a charlatan. I respect him because he hoodwinks the scamps of the Hamburg congregation. but the late Cartouche, of sainted memory, I respect still higher." Cartouche was a noted criminal of those days, and Graetz, omitting the derogatory words, actually misrepresents Heine's remarks. Bernays was supposed to be the author of a pamphlet called "The Biblical Orient," in which some rationalistic ideas are presented, especially the statement that sacrifices will at one time cease. This naturally was the main idea of reform, and Bernays afterwards denied having written this pamphlet, which had appeared anonymously. His disciple, Samson Hirsch, speaks in somewhat vague terms He said merely, it has never been proven that Bernays was the author, and anyone who knew him would hardly suspect him to have written such remarks, but if he ever did write them, he had surely outgrown these ideas at the time, when he entered Hamburg. I suppose that the main feature in Bernay's life and the importance which he gained, when he came to Hamburg, was due to the fact that there was a strictly observant Jew, who could speak a correct German. He certainly did inspire a number of young people at the most impressionable age, who, with a feeling of romantic sorrow regarded the sad situation of a decline of old religion, and expected to revive it by modern methods. Certainly Samson Hirsch was one of them. He had originally been destined for a mercantile career, and as a boy entered some business house, but at an early age he abandoned this idea, went first to Mannheim, where another representative of milder orthodox, Jacob Etlinger, was then rabbi. Afterwards he went to Bonn, where he attended the university for one year without, of course, taking a degree, and before he was twenty-two years old, he succeeded the late Nathan Adler, subsequently chief rabbi of London, as Landrabbiner of Oldenburg. The title "Landrabbiner" for a young man not quite twenty-two years old, sounds indeed big, and we may say it is quite an event though the congregations of Oldenburg were a few village settlements with a very small population, and not distinguished by great learning. The main point was that the government should be satisfied, because these small states took a particular interest in "educating" the Jews.

The July revolution of 1830 had made the question of the emancipation of the Jews acute. The government of the small states in Germany acknowledged the urgent need of a reform, but they wanted to make the Jews first worthy of the charitable act to be conferred upon them. So the government of the Grandduchy of Oldenburg had first to ascertain whether the young man proposed as spiritual guide of the Jews, would be the right kind of man to help the government in its civilizing intentions. Inquiries were made at Hamburg which resulted in ascertaining the fact that the young man was a member of a strictly orthodox family, but inasmuch as he was cultured, it was to be anticipated that he would culture his parishioners. Indeed he seemed in the beginning to justify the anticipation. He abrogated the Kol Nidre. This was one of the points on which great stress was laid in those days. Among the charges preferred against the Jews was that they considered their obligations to Christians not binding, and absolved themselves on every Yom Kippur by a ceremony, which declared all their oaths and obligations void. The charge has long ago been proven as groundless, but since it has been repeated over and over again, it may be well to state the actual facts. The Jews were exceedingly scrupulous in the interpretation of an obligation incurred by promise. Orthodox Jews will today when they speak of a contemplated action, even if it has no solemn character, as a promise to call on a friend, add the words: "B'li neder" (this is not to be understood as an obligation). Fearing the effect of a sin committed by an unfulfilled promise (Prov. 20, 25), they introduced the practice to recite on the eve of the day of atonement, destined to repentance, a formula that their promises should not be considered a solemn vow. The enemies of the Jews based on this the charge that the Jews are absolutely unscrupulous in their interpretation of an oath, although the formula does not include promises made to another party. During the early years of the fight for emancipation, the charge against Kol Nidre was a weighty argument, and therefore progressive rabbis abrogated it; Samson Hirsch was one of them. His teacher, Bernays, did not like to see his pupil make a concession to reform, and the story goes that when the young Landrabbiner visited in his native city, Bernays, in the course of conversation, spoke of Yom Kippur, and, as if struck by aphasia, said: "How do you call the Eve of Yom Kippur?" Hirsch went into the trap, and supplied the word "Kol Nidre." Bernays, with a smile, said: "I wonder how you know it?"

This was, as far as I know, the only concession which Hirsch made to reform.

As Landrabbiner of Oldenburg, Hirsch wrote his first epoch-making work, "Neunzehn Briefe des Ben Usiel", a pamphlet which appeared in 1836. Two years later his most prominent work was published, the "Chaurew oder Versuche ueber Jissroel's Pflichten". Fifty years later, a few months before his death, the aged rabbi had the satisfaction of being able to publish a second edition of his work. He says in his preface that, though half a century has elapsed, he does not find it necessary to alter one word. This is indeed a rare record, although to the unprejudiced mind it would rather appear to prove an unwillingness, and not an impossibility, to learn anything more.

NEWS FROM RUSSIA.

In Slonim, in the Province of Grodno, fire destroyed 120 Jewish stores, doing damage to the extent of several million rubles. There are 106 soup kitchens in operation in the City of Lodz. These kitchens serve out daily over 100,000 meals.

According to recent information, the police placed all obstacles in the way of Jewish workers in the mines of Southern Russia who have no right of residence there. Owing to the absolute necessity of getting out as much coal as possible, the Congress Executive of Mine Owners petitioned the Governor to allow Jewish miners the right of temporary residence. To this the Governor replied that the special provisions affecting the right of residence of Jews could not be put aside.

Jewish Workers Placed Under Arrest.

Thirteen Jewish workers were arrested at the office of the Kieff Union Metal Workers. The police explained their arrest by their wish to find out whether the Jews had the right of residence in Kieff. The union sent a strong protest to the local authorities against the latter's use of the union quarters as a trap for Jews having no right of residence.

Yugend Verband Provides for Homeless Children.

The "Verband of the Yiddishe Yugend" of Bialestock took upon itself last month to provide for homeless children. In the cheap "soup kitchen" which they maintain, they originally catered for 60 and now look after 72 children. Of this number, 30 per cent are the offspring of Russian soldiers. The children get lunch and are then entertained by various of the Verband members until 5 o'clock in the evening.

Karaite Clergy Exempt from Service.

The Department of the Interior introduced a bill which exempts all Karaite spiritual leaders from military service.

The Laws of Incorporation Revised.

The ministry of commerce has a commission engaged in reforming the laws of incorporation. On this commission are representatives of credit organizations and all branches of commerce and industry. The commission has to consider the new law recently worked out by the department of commerce.

This law would do away with the necessity of requesting permission from the government for the founding of incorporated companies, it being sufficient merely that notification of the fact be forwarded to the department of commerce. The law also aims to modify certain restrictions which bear a religious character. The ministry does not consider it timely to repeal these restrictions completely.

Temporary Release from Service for Jewish Clergy.

The question of granting Rabbis temporary exemption from service is finally settled. The exemption will apply to all Rabbis over the age of 30 whose position has been affirmed by the governors of provinces before Oct. 31, 1916.

Conference of Rabbis at Lublin, Russia.

On Sept. 12 and 13 a conference of Rabbis was held at Lublin. Fifty-one Jewish dignitaries were present from Polish habitations in Austria, representatives of the Austrian authorities administering the city, and prominent Jews took part in the proceedings. The following was on the agenda:

1. Sanitary and hygienic questions.
2. Ethical culture.
3. The question of regulating birth records.

From this it can be seen that the Rabbis, even in the Austrian provinces, have gained a wider conception of their duties. Very lively debates were indulged in over these questions, and with right it was pointed out that the unfortunate hygienic conditions existing among the Jewish population is interwoven with their critical material condition, and therefore efforts should be made to firstly improve the unsatisfactory conditions affecting them materially. At the close of the conference different committees were elected who will have to carry out the various resolutions adopted.

One of the most enjoyable functions that have been held during the season was the social evening given by the Daughters of the Covenant Auxiliary to Samuel Lodge of Vancouver on Sunday evening, Dec. 10, at the residence of Mrs. L. Melekov. The evening was set aside to secure funds for buying material for Red Cross work. It was a distinct social and financial success. The spacious rooms were filled with a large assembly of guests who enjoyed a varied entertainment consisting of a musical program, vaudeville numbers, recitations and cards. ABRAHAM LIPPMAN LODGE PREPARES FOR BENEFIT BALL.

Having pledged themselves to raise $2,000 toward payment of a $38,000 mortgage on the orphanage in Erie of District No. 3, Abraham Lippman Lodge No. 672 is arranging for the benefit of the orphanage what is expected to be the biggest social event of the year—a mid-winter ball, to take place Jan. 16 in the William Penn Hotel.

A special feature of the evening will be a souvenir program de luxe which will contain among other things articles of special interest to Jewry everywhere. These are now being prepared by Dr. J. Leonard Levy; A. L. Solomon, past president of the Grand Lodge of District No. 3, and Frank R. S. Kaplan, a member of the Executive Committee.

The event has special value in view of the fact that it is being given by the Abraham Lippman Lodge — a lodge named after one of the noblest philanthropists Pittsburgh or any other community has ever known. Inspired always by the highest ideals, Abraham Lippman's life may be regarded as a brilliant model for those who feel the impulse of better things, and it is the deeds of this great man that have prompted the activities of Abraham Lippman Lodge since its organization some years ago.

The Erie Orphanage, which is to receive the proceeds from this mid-winter charity ball, is unique in arrangement and is said to differ largely from most institutions of like purpose. The orphanage is organized on the cottage plan, a small group of children being housed in each cottage and fostered by a man and woman, the aim being to give the children as near a substitute for actual home life as is possible.

The B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3, located near Erie, Pa., will soon make an effort to raise $25,000 to pay off the indebtedness on the buildings.

During the District Grand Lodge Convention held in Erie on July 24, 25, 26, 1916, after the reading of the annual report of President Isador Sobel, emphasizing the financial condition of the institution, Rabbi Silver, of Wheeling, W. Va., made an appeal to the delegates and visitors present, and within the space of two hours $27,000 was pledged by lodges and individuals. The total indebtedness on the buildings is $50,000. The pledges, amounting to $27,000, are to be paid on or before July 25, 1917. The balance of $23,000 is hoped will be subscribed, not only by the members of the B'nai B'rith in District No. 3, but by the Jewish citizens generally, as this institution is not limited in its admissions to children coming from members of the B'nai B'rith, but any Jewish child in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, West Virginia and Delaware, friendless or orphan, deserving of admission, is admitted.

EZEKIEL LODGE, NEWARK, N. J.

Miss Julia Hess, of Erie, Pa., delivered a eulogy on the life and work of Mrs. Phoebe Sugarman, president of the Ladies Auxiliary, who was one of the most ardent workers in the cause of the Order.

A. H. Fromenson, representing the National Farm School of Philadelphia, also addressed the lodge on the work the school is doing for Judaism and humanity.

The lodge is engaged in making preparations for the observance of its Golden Jubilee, Feb. 27, 1917, at which time it hopes to have as speakers at the banquet some of the foremost men of the country as well as the Executive Committee of the Order.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

At a well attended meeting of Harmony Lodge No. 711, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 26, 1916, Dr. Maurice E. Rosen was elected president for the ensuing year.

Beside the installation of officers, some fine degree-team work was shown and a musical program was rendered. Harmony Lodge reports having had a great growth during the last year, both numerically and financially, and a greater year than ever is looked for in 1917.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

During the past month Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, occupied the pulpit of Rev. Dr. Leon Harrison, who was in New York City. In addition to preaching, Dr. Coffee found time to get in touch with B'nai B'rith members and intensify the work of the Big Brother movement. A special meeting was called on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 24, when representatives from both lodges held a joint meeting and talked over the local situation with the Social Service Director. The Big Brother movement has already been started and it will soon be greatly extended. The problem of caring for released prisoners will receive more careful attention and everything possible will be done for those entitled to an early parole. Bros. A. L. Levi and B. Greenfelder, the presidents of Ebn Ezra and Missouri lodges, expect to name a strong body who shall act as a joint committee for St. Louis.

MAGIC CITY LODGE, BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Magic City Lodge, No. 725, began the year of 1917 with a record-breaking meeting on Sunday, Jan. 7. The membership in attendance was so large that chairs had to be borrowed and placed in the spacious lodge room at the Fraternal Hall. Five new names were added to the ever increasing membership of the lodge. The beautiful initiation ceremony was impressive and rekindled the good and noble feeling of self-sacrifice in the hearts of not only the new members, but the old as well.

A short recess for refreshments was greatly enjoyed by every member present.

Installation of the newly elected officers followed. Bro. F. A. Abelson, member of the General Committee, District No. 7, represented the Grand Lodge. He was assisted by Bros. J. Kartus and T. H. Swedlan. The new officers of Magic City Lodge, No. 725, are as follows: President, D. J. Feidelson; Vice-President, I. Abelson, Secretary, Chas. A. Lass (re-elected for the fourth time and is also past president of the lodge); Treasurer, Isadore Shapiro; Monitor, Louis Silberman; Assistant Monitor, M. J. Wolowitz; Warden, P. Sewelowitz; Trustees: I. Copeland, A. Tennenbaum, and Julius Goldstein.

At the request of Bro. E. R. Bernstein, president of District No. 7, Bros. B. Wadel and M. Faber, of Tyler, Tex., visited Sherman and Denison, Tex., with a view of organizing there a B'nai B'rith lodge. Their efforts were crowned with success, and on Sunday, Dec. 3, a lodge was organized at Sherman, into which every Jew living in the city was enrolled.

The entire assembly went over to Denison, calling on the brethren living there, and obtained their promise to establish a B'nai B'rith lodge in that community. An informal gathering was held at the home of Mr. K. Karchmer, where Bros. B. Wadel and M. Faber explained the aims, object and beauty of the I. O. B. B. All present expressed the desire to join in the noble work of the Order. Monday, Dec. 4, Bros. B. Wadel and M. Faber spent with the brethren of Denison, and at 8 p. m. organized Denison Lodge.

While these committees are small, yet nearly every Jew dwelling in these cities joined or expressed the desire of joining in the work and help to carry on the noble ideals of the I. O. B. B.

McKEESPORT LODGE, McKEESPORT, PA.

At a most enthusiastic meeting, McKeesport Lodge No. 576 made good the pledge of its delegates at the recent district convention when the lodge was pledged in the sum of $500 towards the Erie Orphanage Fund. After Bro. Eugene Krow, one of the delegates to the convention, had read an extract from the report of the convention with reference to the financial condition of the Orphanage, an appeal was made to the brothers present.

The spirit of giving was in the air and within fifteen minutes the sum of $625 in cash had been raised; this amount will be augmented by contributions from those members who were not present at the meeting and from all indications McKeesport will contribute twice the amount its delegates pledged at the convention.

McKeesport Lodge will celebrate its twelfth anniversary in the latter part of April with an entertainment, at which time some of the most prominent men in American Jewry are expected to be present.

ANNUAL BANQUET OF CLEVELAND LODGE, CLEVELAND, O.

Sunday, Dec. 17, was a busy day at the B'nai B'rith building, the occasion being the annual banquet of Cleveland Lodge. The banquet, which was attended by several hundred members and friends, was preceded by the initiation of a large class of candidates.

The speakers of the evening were Sidney Kusworm, of Dayton, a member of the General Committee of the District; Carl Vetsburg, of St. Louis, president of the District; Rabbi Moses J. Gries and Sigmund Livingston, of Bloomington, Ill., chairman of the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith. William R. Weidenthal, president of the local lodge, acted as toastmaster. Dancing followed the speaking.

Mr. Sigmund Livingston told of the good work achieved by the Anti-Defamation League; how it has stopped the caricaturing of the Jew in motion pictures, the ridicule of the Jew on the stage, the defaming of the Jew in books and literature and the discriminating against the Jew in hotels and apartment houses. He mentioned many specific incidents in which the league had saved the Jew from defamation.

Mr. Carl Vetsburg told of the unselfish principles of the Order. Members are offered no glittering reward, such as sick, death or any other similar benefits, except the privilege of belonging to an organization that supports the sick, the widow, the orphan and the needy.

Rabbi Gries extolled the principles of peace that the B'nai B'rith preaches. Sidney Kusworm spoke on the motto of the Order, "Benevolence. Brotherly Love and Harmony."

Mr. A. Lowenthal, in behalf of the lodge, presented President William R. Weidenthal with a silver loving cup in appreciation of his loyal service to Cleveland Lodge.

Miss Mabel Fishel and Miss Sylvia Benedict rendered several vocal selections.

The committee in charge of the affair were B. Benson, chairman, George Klein and Alfred A. Benesch.

It was just a year ago this month that the B'nai B'rith dedicated its new home. Because of the unusual amount of activities, Cleveland Lodge has been the center of interest and praise all over the country. Many other activities are planned for the coming eyar and it is hoped to make the B'nai B'rith building a center for the Jewish community of Cleveland.

MASSACHUSETTS LODGE, BOSTON, MASS.

Members of the Massachusetts Lodge, B'nai B'rith, discussed definite plans for the formation of a Big Brother League Wednesday evening, Dec. 20, at a meeting under the auspices of the lodge at the Hotel Brunswick. The aim of the league would be to diminish juvenile delinquency among the Jewish boys of Greater Boston.

Judge A. K. Cohen, president of District No. 1, pointed out the value of such a league and appealed to those present to personally seek out and assist young Jewish persons released from penal and correctional institutions. He described how the movement had progressed in other localities.

Richard Herman, president of the lodge, who directed the meeting, appealed for volunteers in the movement. A number of physicians, attorneys and business men promised to do all in their power to help at least one young person, who has made himself amenable to the law, to do right.

Speaking of the benefits of such a league, Judge Cohen said: "The Big Brother work has appealed to the membership of the Order in other localities, with the result that much benefit to the individuals and to their respective communities has already been obtained. Properly carried on, this effort may assume tremendous proportions, being the only thoroughly organized movement along these lines dealing specifically with the Jewish boy of wayward tendencies."

LASKER LODGE, SAN DIEGO, CAL.

At a recent meeting of Lasker Lodge, No. 370, of San Diego, Cal., a handsome medal was presented to Bro. I. T. Davidson by Bro. Simon Levy on behalf of the lodge, who 30 years ago was its first president. Mr. Levy made a happy talk, in which he reminded the lodge of the early struggles when a few members endeavored to maintain the organization.

There was a large attendance at the meeting and among those present were three charter members. Another feature of the meeting was the election of officers for the ensuing term and delegates to the convention of the District Grand Lodge to be held in San Francisco.

FLINT LODGE, FLINT, MICH.

At an enthusiastic meeting of Flint Lodge No. 656, held at Flint, Mich.. on Jan. 7, 1917, 22 candidates were initiated into the Order. With an attendance of 50, the first meeting held by Flint Lodge in nine months proved a great success. Through the efforts of Bro. Edward Lichtig of Bay City, and with the co-operation of the officers of the lodge, the B'nai B'rith of Flint has again come to the front, with every indication of continued prosperity.

Following the initiation ceremonies, directed by a team composed of Rabbi Freund of Grand Rapids, Mr. Lichtig of Bay City and Mr. Lashman of Chicago, the members were addressed by Rabbi Freund on the purposes, ideals and achievements of the B'nai B'rith. Mr. Lashman addressed the lodge on the achievements in Social Service through the B'nai B'rith.

At a meeting held in the evening, to which the public was invited, the members and their friends were addressed by Rabbi Freund and by Mr. Lashman. Rabbi Freund delivered a very inspiring talk on "The Jew and His Story". Mr. Lashman, who is in charge of the Social Service Department of the B'nai B'rith of Chicago, addressed the meeting on "The Meaning and the Methods of Personal Social Service". Both of these talks were well received by the people of Flint and it is expected that results will soon be shown along the lines of suggestion made in the talks.

Mr. Lashman in his address called the attention of the audience to the fact that there are three ways of doing Social Service and that these ways are followed by the same number of groups of individuals. That one group is liberal in its contributions to institutions by means of the check book, another group is willing to give liberally of time and personal sacrifice, and that the third group is a class of men that will give of themselves the best there is in them to be of help to the unfortunate.

Mr. Lashman further said in his address:

"Now, my friends, what is it that you yourselves can do in the City of Flint in the way of Social Service? You cannot shut your eyes to the fact that we have in society such classes as delinquents, dependents and defectives. Each day our philanthropic and benevolent institutions are receiving applicants—men, women and children who belong to one of these classes. Some are blind and some are deaf; some are crippled and in other ways handicapped from earning their livelihood; some lack the mentality required to earn a living for themselves—people who are too feeble-minded to undertake tasks necessary to be accomplished in order to earn a sufficient amount to enable them to exist. Still others lack the moral stamina, so that they are unable to resist temptation, unable to obey the laws set for the guidance of men and women, and so they become, in the eyes of the law, delinquents—people who must be confined.

"Each day our institutions receive applicants from one or the other of these classes. Each day our institutions discharge some who have entered, but for every one discharged there are always at least two others who apply for admission.

"Doesn't this indicate to you, my friends, that this method of doing Social Service is but a method whereby we endeavor to heal the wounds rather than prevent them; a method whereby we confine criminals rather than prevent criminals; a method whereby we alleviate poverty rather than abolish it? Is it not far wiser to start upon a course of procedure that will endeavor to eliminate entirely the need for institutions which house delinquents, dependents and defectives?

"I want to stress this phase of Social Service. I want each one of you here tonight to think what might be done in your city to prevent crime, prevent disease, to prevent poverty. I wonder how many of you here would like to do what my friend Mr. X. did. His work surely was one of prevention. In his case he surely saw to it that at least one individual would not knock at the doors of an institution for either financial or moral aid. Cannot you, also, each one of you, every man and woman present here, take unto himself and herself, one individual and see to it that such individual leads a cleaner, a purer and more wholesome life? I feel that if we each did this we would accomplish a great deal toward eliminating the great classes that are a burden upon society.

"You have here in your city a number of children who are receiving no religious education whatever. Some of you here who are versed in the Jewish religion and history should take it upon themselves to organize Sunday School classes and teach these children to know something of their people, their history and their ideals. There are in the City of Flint a number of people who are not citizens. Those of you who are citizens and who possess the power of teaching others to become citizens should take it upon themselves to assist these poeple in becoming citizens of our country. There are a number of Jewish people in Flint who cannot read or write, people who hesitate to attend the public night schools. Those of you who are in a position to assist these should take it upon yourselves to teach them the rudiments of the English language. There are a number of boys who would be benefited by the attention and influence of an older man. Some of you men should be Big Brothers to these boys. There are a number of girls who need friendly advice and the guidance of an older woman. Some of you women should take it upon yourselves to be Big Sisters to these girls.

"I have outlined to you a policy of procedure, such a policy as the Social Service Committee of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is endeavoring to carry out in the City of Chicago, such a policy as every lodge of the B'nai B'rith in the country should endeavor to carry out in its own community. Think seriously of these matters, my friends, and see if you cannot do something in the City of Flint toward preventing crime and poverty."

This meeting served to introduce to each other Jewish people in Flint who had never met before, although they had been residing within a short distance of each other.

Another meeting of the lodge has been called for Sunday, Jan. 21, at which meeting a class of 15 candidates will be initiated. Dr. R. I. Coffee of Chicago, National Director of the Order's Social Service, will be the guest of honor. Flint Lodge is to be congratulated upon its reorganization and the plans undertaken for the future.

Chananiah Lodge had a most interesting installation ceremony Sunday, Jan. 7. The installation was public. A large gathering of enthusiastic B'nai B'rith and their families were present. Bro. Albert Weiss was installed as president of the lodge for the ensuing year. The installing officer on the occasion was the District Secretary, Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, who was assisted by Past Presidents S. Gallinger and Henry Weiss. Bro. Emanuel Stern, the Nestor of the lodge, spoke beautifully on the work of the Order, and so did the president-elect, Bro. Albert Weiss and Past President Henry Weiss. Very appropriate remarks on the occasion were also made by Bro. Moses Oppenheimer and the installing officers. The installation was followed by an interesting musical program and dance.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATION BY EL PASO LODGE

El Paso Lodge No. 509 of El Paso, Texas, celebrated B'nai B'rith Day at Temple Mt. Sinai in connection with the dedication of the building, on Dec. 11, 1916. Rabbi George Fox of Fort Worth was the principal speaker.

"The B'nai B'rith is more inclusive than the temple organization or the synagog organization," declared Rabbi Fox. "It concerns itself, with neither reform or orthodoxy, nor with whether a man is a German or a Hungarian, a Pole or a Russian.

Distinctions Forgotten.

"When a Jew enters the B'nai B'rith hall he immediately becomes my brother. I leave behind me all distinctions. If there is any place where there is democracy in Jewish life, it is not in the temple, it is not in the synagog, but it is in the B'nai B'rith lodge room.

"Charity is a noble conception, but what we owe most to our downfallen brother is not charity, but justice. Charity may become uncharitable. Greater than charity is self-respect.

"B'nai B'rith has assumed the task of showing to the world what Jewish self-respect is."

Doom of Hebrew Comedian.

As an example of this, the speaker pointed to the virtual banishment of the "Hebrew vaudevillian" from the modern American stage.

"The synagog did not do it; the temple did not do it; B'nai B'rith did it," he exclaimed.

The speaker told of a heated interview he once held with a celebrated Hebrew comedian, and of the campaign that was waged by B'nai B'rith against this man, so that he later admitted that the B'nai B'rith had made "things so hot for him that he would never come back to the State of Texas."

Caricature Banned.

"Since that time there never has been a comedian on that circuit that has made up as a grotesque caricature of the Jew," said Rabbi Fox. "One was going to do so, but he was firmly told that he must take off his beard."

The increase in population has made it necessary, the speaker pointed out, that active steps be taken to lift the fallen brother.

The Big Brothers.

"That is why the 'big brother' conception came into being," he said. "The big brother movement was formed to see that every Jew who has fallen is given a chance. Who can evaluate the saving of one Jewish boy from the prison or penitentiary? When you see one of the boys who were sliding down the moral grade again interested in the pure and wholesome things of life, you will understand what B'nai B'rith means, if you do not know it already.

"The Jew is a law-abiding citizen. B'nai B'rith does not mean that when a Jew has broken the law a committee should storm the jail and try to get him out. B'nai B'rith helps him before he has broken the law, or after he has done so and paid the penalty. It helps keep his self-respect, or it helps him regain it. It does not help him cheat the law."

Rabbi Fox closed with an appeal to the younger men especially, urging them to join the movement, "as exemplifying the highest ideals of Judaism."

Tribute to Heller.

A touching bit in the services was the sincere tribute paid to the next speaker, the venerable Rabbi Max Heller, of New Orleans, La., by Rabbi Martin Zielonka, and the pathos-tinged dignity with which the elder man replied.

"To one who is on the declining side of life, it is pleasing to know that the younger men of his profession remember the elder-brotherly interest that he has shown in them," began Dr. Heller.

"It is not by way of awkward reciprocation of a compliment, but in all sincerity, that I say that I have been more and more impressed with the achievement of your many-sided and resourceful spiritual guide."

What "B'nai B'rith" Means.

Dr. Heller analyzed the meaning of the phrase "B'nai B'rith" to mean not the commonly accepted "Sons of the covenant," but "Bound by a covenant."

"The covenant is this: 'So long as Israel makes the Lord its God, so long will the Lord make Israel his people.'

"The phrase 'Chosen people' is not a childish conceit, but is regarded by the Jews as a conditional promise.

Religion is Bond.

"'Bound by a covenant.' That covenant is religion. B'nai B'rith and the synagog must go together. This is the second dedication at which I have found a synagog a home for the B'nai B'rith."

The rabbi closed his address by indorsing and elaborating on a suggestion made by Rabbi Zielonka, relative to the establishment of a men's club. He earnestly appealed to the congregation to utilize its remarkable equipment for serious and fruitful work and to hold up the hands of its leader.

MENORAH LODGE, BALTIMORE, MD.

Menorah Lodge No. 771 of Baltimore has started a most commendable movement in inaugurating a course of lectures of marked interest to the Jewish public, both from a Jewish and cultural point of view. The first lecture was held on Jan. 7. Mr. I. G. Dobsevage, secretary of the Jewish Publication Society of America, spoke on "The Romance of Jewish Literature."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Springfield Lodge No. 684 held an installation of officers at their club rooms in the Adaskin building, Jan. 10, 1917. The Grand Lodge was ably represented by Mr. Samuel J. Witz of New Haven, the installing officer, and Henry Lasker of Springfield. Judge Jacob A. Asher of Worcester represented the Worcester lodge. Mr. M. Hirsch of Holyoke represented the Holyoke lodge.

Both Mr. Witz and Judge Asher made an urgent appeal for the relief of the Jewish war sufferers. P. L. Davison, the retiring president of the local lodge, was presented with a solid gold fob, containing a replica of the "Menorah," the emblem of the Order of B'nai B'rith. The meeting was well attended, the chairmen of the various committees made complete reports of their various activities of the year.

The inaugural address of the newly-elected president, Frederic Cohn, was the most interesting feature of the evening and showed that he was fully cognizant of the workings of the lodge and its requirements. He was heartily assured by the members of their earnest co-operation. After the meeting refreshments were served.

The following officers were installed: President, Frederic Cohn; vice-president, Frederick Rabinobitz; recording secretary, William M. Ziff; financial secretary, Alexander Mikola; treasurer, Joseph W. Gelfman; monitor, P. L. Davison; assistant monitor, Joseph Hertzmark; warden, Louis B. Miller; guardian, Alfred Katz; trustees, Dr. Myron Wessler, Raphael Sagalyn and William F. Katz.

JACOB H. SCHIFF LODGE, LANSING, MICH.

On Sunday, Dec. 10, a splendid rally was held in the lodge rooms of Jacob H. Schiff Lodge of Lansing, Mich., when eight new members were initiated by Bros. Edward Lichtig of Bay City and Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director of Chicago. The initiatory ceremony was very impressive. Speeches suitable to the occasion were made by Bro. J. Simon of Lansing, Bro. Lichtig and Dr. Coffee. At the conclusion of the meeting divine services were held and Kaddish recited by those in mourning.

The evening's meeting was open to the public and drew a very large crowd. In addition to a splendid musical program, three Rabbis graced the occasion. Rabbi Charles J. Freund of Grand Rapids pleaded most earnestly with the members of the community, and particularly with B'nai B'rith colleagues, to start a synagogue in the city. Rabbi J. Weinstein of Goshen, Ind.. who had come earlier in the day to officiate at a B'rith Milah, congratulated his friends on the fine spirit of enthusiasm which had recently been awakened in Lansing. He was pleased to observe that Jewish people of the city thought in terms of spiritual gain as well as financial advance. Dr. Coffee brought a message of actual accomplishment to the members of the Order. He told of the great work which is being done under the direction of the Anti-Defamation League battering down prejudice and encouraging Jews to stand by their ideals. He told of the splendid progress which the Social Service Department is making and how its branches are spreading out to all parts of the country. Lansing, which has state institutions as well as a large college within its boundary, offers a fine field for Social Service endeavor. Its people should look after the young folks in these various institutions and aid them to keep in touch with Jewish life.

It is doubtful if the Jewish folks of Lansing ever had such a remarkable gathering in the past. Certainly the B'nai B'rith lodge should take on new life for the future.

A man's reach should exceed his grasp, or what's a heaven for?—Robert Browning.

B'nai B'rith of Chicago

David Fish Lodge No. 130 is making arrangements for a meeting to be held on January 15, 1917, at the Hotel Morrison. The special features of the meeting will be the installation of officers and the visit of Rabbi S. G. Boettigheimer of Peoria, Ill., who will address the members and guests on the subject, "B'nai B'rith Achievements—Fundamental and Monumental."

Brother Hugo Sonnenschein of Chicago was a guest of honor at the annual meeting of David Fish Lodge No. 130 at its annual meeting held at the Hotel Morrison on December 18th. After the regular order of business was disposed of, which included action on a large class of candidates, election of officers and delegates to the Grand Lodge Convention, Brother Sonnenschein addressed the lodge on the subject, "Grand-children of the Ghetto." He pictured before the audience the life and conditions of our co-religionists in foreign lands, recited the privations and sacrifices endured by them and then contrasted the life of ease and plenty enjoyed by the grandchildren of these heroic pioneers. He laid stress upon the necessity of maintaining not only the Jewish faith and its ideals, but what is of more importance, to live up to them. At the close of his address, a rising vote of thanks was tendered to the speaker.

Ramah Lodge No. 33, held its annual meeting at the Hotel La Salle on December 11th. The attendance was unusually large, numbering more than three hundred. The regular order of business took up a great deal of time, as over two hundred candidates were acted upon. This was followed by the election of officers for the ensuing term, also delegates to the District Grand Lodge Convention. The special feature of the evening was an address by Rabbi Max J. Merritt, of Evansville, Ind., who spoke on the subject, "Through the Desert of Sinai to the Holy Land." Rabbi Merritt, in his lecture, which was accompanied by stereopticon views, recited personal experiences while on a journey, partly by foot and partly by almost primitive conveyances, through the desert to Jerusalem. His lecture was most interesting and instructive and although he spoke for over an hour, he kept his audience interested and when he finished his address the gathering rose simultaneously and rendered him an ovation. After the close of the meeting, which was past midnight, luncheon was served and a social hour was spent.

Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72, held its annual meeting on Tuesday, December 26th, on which occasion the annual reports of the officers were presented and the election of officers and delegates was held, and a large number of candidates wer elected to membership. The special feature of the evening was an address by Dr. Simon Peiser, Superintendent of the Jewish Orphan Asylum of Cleveland, on the subject, "The care of the orphan among the Jews." Doctor Peiser illustrated his address with stereopticon views. The subject dealt mainly with the care bestowed upon the orphan in the institution which is under his guidance. He depicted, by means of the screen, the ideal life of the child in the institute, the course of training that he undergoes and the care and solicitude bestowed upon him, not only by the officials of the Home, but by all those who are in any manner connected with the maintenance of the institution. At the close of his address, a rising vote of thanks was tendered to the speaker.

Under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council, representing the Chicago lodges, a card party was held at the Hotel La Salle on the evening of December 27th. The audience numbered more than eight hundred and spent a most pleasant evening in the enjoyment of various games. Prizes for the successful players were awarded at the close of the evening and refreshments were served.

The Membership Campaign inaugurated by the Central B'nai B'rith Council has been brought to a close. A total of 538 candidates were secured, of which 176 belong to Oriental-Hillel Lodge, 75 to David Fish Lodge, and 287 to Ramah Lodge. The Council has arranged for a monster class initiation to be held at the Hotel La Salle on Saturday evening, Jan. 14th, at which time the official degree team of the Council will perform the initiatory ceremonies. Mr. Sig Livingston of Bloomington, Ill., the chairman of the Anti-Defamation League of the Order, will be the principal speaker and will address the audience on the subject, "The Jew in public opinion." The arrangement committee is preparing for this occasion also a program consisting of musical and vocal numbers, vaudeville, and will, at the close of the evening, serve refreshments and cigars.

The B'nai B'rith Cemetery Association of Chicago, held its annual meeting on January 10, 1917, at the office of the Chairman, Judge Philip Stein. Reports of officers were presented, from which it was evident that the association is in a flourishing condition and that its financial affairs are well looked after and that a handsome balance is to the credit of the association at the end of the year. Officers for the ensuing year were elected, resulting in the election of all retiring officers. The committee on By-Laws and Constitution, submitted various recommendations to amend the existing laws and final action thereon was deferred until the next quarterly meeting.

The Central B'nai B'rith Council representing the Chicago lodges held its annual meeting on January 11th, 1917. President Brother Dr. H. I. Davis, presented an exhaustive report, dwelling on the activities of the Council during the past year. Special emphasis was laid therein on the work of the Social Service Department under the auspices of the Council and under the special guidance of a professional worker. The financial reports presented showed the Council to be in a flourishing condition, having nearly a thousand dollars remaining as an unexpended balance in the Treasury. The election of officers resulted in the promotion of the Vice President of the Council, Brother Edward Sonnenschein, to the presidency by a unanimous election. The other officers elected were as follows: Dr. Harry A. Kraus, Vice-President; Julian J. Gusfield, Secretary, and A. B. Seelenfreund, Treasurer. The Executive Board of the Council consists of the officers of the Council, its Past Presidents, namely, Brother Israel Cowen and A. B. Seelenfreund, and one representative from each lodge elected at the meeting, namely, Hon. Sidney Lyon, of Ramah Lodge, Maurice Markowitz, of Oriental-Hillel Lodge, and B. Stenge, representing David Fish Lodge. The newly elected officers were installed and took charge of the affairs of the Council at this meeting.

The committee on "Summer camp for poor boys" submitted a report that it had secured a free site and also the promise from the railroad companies for free transportation from the city to the camp. The Council unanimously resolved to place to the credit of the committee the sum of one thousand dollars to be used in connection with the establishment of the camp. The lodges of Chicago were urged to interest themselves in this new phase of B'nai B'rith work and to render such financial assistance as its means will permit.

The Superintendent of the Labor Bureau presented an annual report from which it was evident that the Bureau is fulfilling its mission in a large degree and that it has become a blessing to the unfortunate and poor who are not in position to help themselves.

B'nai B'rith Day Celebration.

Under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council representing all the Chicago lodges, B'nai B'rith Day was fittingly observed with a banquet at the Hotel LaSalle on Saturday evening, January 6th, 1917. Nearly eleven hundred members and their ladies participated and the affair proved from all standpoints the biggest success ever secured by the Chicago lodges in undertakings of this character. Brother Edward Sonnenschein, First Vice President of the Grand Lodge, acted as Toastmaster and presented speakers, Prof. E. A. Scott, of the Northwestern University, and Mr. Harry A. Wheeler, First President of the National Chamber of Commerce, who addressed the audience on timely topics and particularly in connection with economic and financial preparedness. The affair was honored by the presence of the following Executive and District Grand Lodge officers: Adolf Kraus, President of the Order; Judge Philip Stein, a member of the Executive Committee of the Order; Dr. H. I. Davis, President of the District Grand Lodge; Hiram D. Frankel of St. Paul, Second Vice-President of the District Grand Lodge; Chas. D. Orokovsky, of Duluth; Julian J. Gusfield, Albert F. Mecklenburger, Samuel Levin of Danville, Ill., members of the General Committee; Sol Levitan of Madison, Wis., Sergeant at Arms of the Grand Lodge, and Brother Gustavus Loevinger of St. Paul, Chairman of the Propaganda Committee of the District Grand Lodge. A number of Past Presidents of District Grand Lodge and Chairmen of various committees were also in attendance.

During the banquet, musical numbers were rendered by professional talent which was much appreciated by the audience. At the close of the program, a reception was held and this was followed by dancing, which lasted until 3 o'clock in the morning.

Jubilee of Rainier Lodge, Seattle, Wash.

The Jubilee meeting held by Rainier Lodge No. 627 at the Scottish Rite Temple, on Dec. 28, 1916, was indeed a red letter day for the B'nai B'rith and will be long remembered by all as one of the most brilliant events in the history of B'nai B'rith in the Northwest.

At 6 a. m., Dec. 28, the Portland delegation of seventeen members of Theodore Herzl Lodge arrived in Seattle, but remained in their private car at the depot until 7 o'clock, at which hour a reception committee from Rainier Lodge came to take care of them.

They were first breakfasted, then later in the day they were taken sight seeing in automobiles along Seattle's boulevards and through the business district, a visit being paid also to the Home for Immigrants, and to the New Settlement House; following which the Portland and Victoria delegations were dined at the Hotel Washington Annex.

The immediate occasion for the Jubilee was the initiation of one of the largest classes of candidates ever held at one time into a B'nai B'rith lodge in Seattle, and was the outcome of the unremitting efforts of Herbert A. Schoenfeld who, as the father of the now famous membership campaign, endeavored to break the record.

The occasion was incidentally made the means of bringing together the various lodges of the Northwest in closer touch and more intimate relations.

A delegation of seventeen members of Theodore Herzl Lodge, I. O. B. B., from Portland, came over on a special train, and a delegation of five members of Victoria Lodge also journeyed to Seattle, Everett Lodge and Hildersheimer Lodge of this city being also well represented. Some two hundred members enjoyed the entertainment, refreshments and elaborate program that had been carefully prepared for them and which was successfully carried out by the entertainment committee of Rainier Lodge who, under the able guidance of Chairman Abe Stusser, did such praiseworthy work.

Class Initiation.

The initiation into Rainier Lodge of a large class of candidates afforded the Seattle B'nai B'rith the most perfect presentation of the ritual ever witnessed. The members of the degree team of Theodore Herzl Lodge of Portland, who at the special invitation of Rainier Lodge consented to put on the work, are thoroughly trained for their parts and, clad in magnificent robes to represent the ancient priests of Israel, they presented a most gorgeous spectacle, and the impressive ceremony of initiation was performed with befitting grandeur and solemnity.

Each noble thought in the ritual was beautifully brought out and properly impressed upon the neophytes with due emphasis.

Entertainment Not to Be Surpassed.

Immediately after the initiatory ceremony, Mr. Abe Stusser, chairman of the entertainment committee, took charge and conducted the entire body to the banquet hall, where the festivities were continued until the hour came for the Portland delegation to depart for home.

Between the speeches, which were delivered as called for by the toastmaster, Mr. Herbert A. Schoenfeld, past president of Rainier Lodge, artists entertained the gathering.

A feature of the banquet was a magnificent cake with an illuminated emblem which was presented by Mr. Hazen T. Titus of the Northern Pacific Railway Company's dining car service.

The cake, which weighed 50 pounds, was daintily decorated in white and gold and bore a beautiful Menorah, which was lighted by small electric bulbs placed in the interior of the cake. It was considered the most remarkable piece of art ever executed by the already famous chief of the Great Northern car service.

Mr. Abe Stusser, in a short, appropriate speech, pointed out that this large gathering was the direct result of the successful campaign for membership conducted by Rainier Lodge.

In this work the various members of Rainier Lodge had been divided into twelve tribes, each named after those of Israel, Mr. Herbert A. Schoenfeld being chosen chief patriarch to lead the campaign.

At this juncture, on behalf of the twelve tribes, Mr. Stusser presented Mr. Schoenfeld with a beautiful loving cup in recognition of the appreciation of the members of his unfailing energy and untiring labor to which the success of the membership campaign was due.

The gift, which came as a great surprise to Mr. Schoenfeld, bears the inscription, "To the Chief Patriarch Herbert A. Schoenfeld, from the Twelve Tribes of Rainier Lodge No. 627, I. O. B. B., Dec. 28, 1916".

In assuming the post of toastmaster, Mr. Schoenfeld told how unexpected the occurrence was to him, and generously declared that the success of the campaign was in reality mostly due to the unselfish efforts of those members who participated in it.

The next on the program was Mr. Albert Pillar, president of Rainier Lodge, whose pleasing duty was to welcome the visiting members and in behalf of Rainier Lodge to thank the degree team of Theodore Herzl Lodge for their magnificent work of the initiatory ceremony.

As he concluded his speech, Mr. Pillar was presented with a Past-President's Jewel, for which he returned suitable thanks.

Mr. David Mossensohn, First Grand Vice-President of District No. 4, in a very eloquent speech, gave a description of the principal work in which the Order is engaged and referred particularly to their activity in the relief of the victims of the European war, and also to the constant care exercised by the B'nai B'rith, through its Anti-Defamation League, to protect the glorious name of Judaism from slander and misrepresentation either in written work, on the moving picture screen or on the legitimate stage.

Entertaining speeches were also made by Dr. M. M. Bettman, District Deputy of Portland lodges; Mr. Julius Shafer, District Deputy for Seattle lodges; Vice-President Freddenstein of Everett Lodge; J. B. Jaffe, President-elect of Victoria Lodge; Milton Friedrich, President of Portland Lodge; J. Lauterstein, President Theodore Herzl Lodge, and Harry Schwartz, President of Bellingham Lodge.

Besides interesting speeches, kindly telegrams and bountiful refreshments, the entertainment committee had high class talent at hand. Mrs. Harry Sigmond rendered a delightful solo on the piano, while Miss Lilly Rosenberg, accompanied by Miss Kaufman, was as perfect as usual in a vocal solo, besides which excellent instrumental music typifying the opposite poles of musical composition were rendered by the Rag Time Trio and the Imperial Russian Soloists and, last but not least, a clever recitation was on the program by Mr. Leslie Stusser, whose name has appeared often on the programs of the Menorah Society.

The time was up then and the Portland delegation hurriedly made for their waiting train, carrying with them the sincere and enthusiastic thanks and best wishes of the entire body assembled at the depot.

The whole affair, from beginning to end, was a huge success. Brotherly love, good will and harmony reigned supreme, and feelings of gratitude filled each one present.

In conclusion, we may mention that the entertainment committee, whose able work made possible Rainier Lodge's Jubilee meeting, was composed of Messrs. Abe Stusser, chairman; Harry Sigmond, Max Silver, Simon Wiener, Meyer Cohen and Sam Clein.

For the present the lodge has 50 members and 10 candidates awaiting initiation. As soon as the home and club shall be completed, there will be no difficulty in securing the membership of every co-religionist in the city. On Jan. 9, the lodge will hold a dance coupled with an entertainment.

CREMIEUX LODGE DEFEATS GOLDEN GATE LODGE IN MEMBERSHIP CONTEST.

A membership contest was held between Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 and Cremieux Lodge No. 325, both of San Francisco, and a well-deserved victory perches upon the banners of Cremieux Lodge. After a year-long struggle, Cremieux emerged triumphant from the membership contest. The lodge is being showered with congratulations from all sources in recognition of the progress made during the past year, representing a 40 per cent gain in membership. The contest has proven a wonderful help to the lodge, and besides the addition of many excellent members, a great deal of increased enthusiasm has been instilled in the members of the lodge.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

At the annual meeting of Golden Gate Lodge No. 129, held on Dec. 20, 1916, the officers for the ensuing term were elected.

An unique feature of the meeting for the following year is the installation in the lodge room of a bulletin board on which are posted the names of all committees and their members, standing as well as special committees. This makes it easy for members to locate the proper parties to take up matters referred to certain committees and likewise tends to keep committeemen in attendance at the meetings.

A report on the advisability of colonizing Jewish immigrants on farms throughout California will be made by special committee at the coming convention of the District Grand Lodge which will meet in San Francisco in February.

The Sabbath school has been started in the much-populated San Brundo district under the auspices of the San Francisco section of the B'nai B'rith Social Service Department.

Preliminary arrangements have been begun for the fifty-fourth annual convention of District Grand Lodge No. 4, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, which will convene in San Francisco Feb. 18, 1917, remaining in session for three days.

Two of the subjects to be considered at the coming sessions are of outstanding interest, one to Pacific Coast Jewry generally and the other to members of the Order in San Francisco.

The first matter is the report of a special committee appointed at the last convention to consider and investigate the subject of Jewish colonization on the Pacific Coast.

This question has been given added importance by the continued immigration of Jews from the Old World to this city, as the western gateway of America, and by the consequent economic problems arising.

The other subject of interest on which a special committee report is forthcoming is the proposed sale of the B'nai B'rith building in San Francisco to the District Grand Lodge under specified conditions.

Two large affairs for the entertainment of the convention were decided on.

On Monday evening following the opening of the convention a reception to the delegates and their ladies will be held at the Hotel St. Francis. A special musical program will be rendered.

On this occasion Rabbi Martin A. Meyer, grand orator of the district, will deliver an address. Other features are being planned.

On the following evening the initiatory team of the Committee of Fifty will give an exemplification of the ritual, wearing robes and illustrating the ceremonial with stereopticon views. While this is in progress a social will be held for the ladies.

The committee of 50 representing the San Francisco lodges arranged a carnival in the B'nai B'rith club rooms on Jan. 7, 1917. Many novel features were arranged and the affair proved an enjoyable one.

Ophir Lodge No. 21 gave a Channukah festival on Dec. 21, 1916, at which the members of the Leo N. Levi Youths' Auxiliary were the special guests.

The committee of 50, composed of delegates from the ten San Francisco lodges, has arranged for a course of lectures upon the subject of "The New Testament from a Jewish Viewpoint", to be delivered in the B'nai B'rith building by the Rev. Martin A. Meyer. Dr. Meyer has kindly consented to hold this course of lectures and has delivered many interesting talks before large and interested audiences, and it is expected that many members of the Order will take advantage of this opportunity. The date will be announced as soon as final arrangements have been completed.

The committee of 50 will hold a grand carnival during the current month for the benefit of the club rooms. Features have been suggested that will open the eyes of the members and the surprises in store will be so numerous that every minute will have its special significance. Arrangements for this affair have nearly been completed and all who attend will be thoroughly entertained. This affair is in charge of Bro. Louis Geballe, who is being assisted by Jos. Glassman, Dr. R. [illegible] Cerf, Morry Rapheld, H. A. Zekind, [illegible] Levin, and several others.

On Monday evening, Jan. 8, the officers of Cremieux Lodge were installed by Bro. Goldsmith, treasurer of the Grand Lodge. The meeting was unusually well attended and the social committee arranged a program of entertainment which not only was elaborate but was full of mirth and good cheer.

The meeting of the lodge held on Dec. 11 will long be remembered by those who were fortunate enough to be present. It was the best meeting ever held by any individual lodge of San Francisco. A class of 25 candidates was initiated, all men of standing and reputation. Spiritual work was exemplified by the degree team of the lodge. After the close of the meeting the lodge and its guests repaired to the banquet hall, where a sumptuous feast was served; 115 members were seated around the festive board. Bro. R. E. Gutstadt, second vice-president of the Grand Lodge, delivered an interesting talk, after which the other officers of the Grand Lodge made pleasing remarks. The gathering was further entertained by vocal selections by Bros. Cantor and Rappaport.

The entertainment committee of the lodge announces that early in February it will hold a carnival in the club rooms which is intended to be unique in many ways.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND.

Theodore Herzl Lodge No. 314 held a well attended meeting on Tuesday, Dec. 12, 1916. Interesting talks were delivered by Bros. Charles F. Berg and Carl A. Press. Mrs. Max Hirsch, representing the Council of Jewish Women, made a plea for a memorial fund. The lodge has taken active steps for the assistance of the Portland Free Hebrew School.

On Monday evening, Dec. 11, 1916, a meeting was called at the B'nai B'rith building by Dr. M. M. Bettman, District Deputy, to organize Jacob Bloch Auxiliary to Portland Lodge No. 416. Officers of the auxiliary were duly elected and the auxiliary was formally instituted.

The degree team of Theodore Herzl Lodge and a large delegation of members of Portland Lodge paid an official visit to Rainier Lodge of Seattle on the occasion of its jubilee. The degree team officiated at the initiation of a large class of candidates of Rainier Lodge.

Portland Lodge, jointly with Jacob Bloch Ladies' Auxiliary, held its first meeting of the year on Tuesday evening, Jan. 2, 1917. The officers of the joint organizations were installed on that occasion.

The last meeting of the year held by Theodore Herzl Lodge No. 314 proved a most successful gathering. A large class of candidates was initiated and the officers for the ensuing year were elected, also delegates to the coming Grand Lodge convention, which will meet in San Francisco next February.

Following the meeting a Dutch lunch was served in the gymnasium of the B'nai B'rith building at which Bro. M. Mosessohn acted as toastmaster and introduced the various speakers in rhyme. Those responding to the toasts included the retiring president, Jacob Lauterstein, who was presented with a beautiful past president's jewel; B. W. Rubin, the president-elect; D. N. Mosessohn, the first vice-president of the Grand Lodge; District Deputy Dr. M. M. Bettman; Vice-President Simon Cohn and Ladies' Auxiliary Deputy Dr. A. Tilzer. The meeting adjourned long after midnight.

Oregon Auxiliary No. 2, Daughters of the Covenant, held its last meeting of the year at the B'nai B'rith building on Tuesday evening, Dec. 26, 1916, which will be long remembered by those who attended. It was one of the most enjoyable meetings held by the organization. Officers for the ensuing year were elected. After the meeting the members enjoyed the annual banquet in which more than 100 participated. Mrs. D. E. Cohn acted as toastmaster and toasts were responded to by the outgoing officers, the newly-elected officers and many members.

The joint public installation of B'nai B'rith lodges of the city and its two ladies' auxiliaries was held on Tuesday, Jan. 2, 1917, in the B'nai B'rith building. District Deputy Dr. M. M. Bettman installed the officers of the lodge and Deputy Dr. A. Tilzer served for the Ladies' Auxiliary.

The meeting was presided over by Bro. Milton Friedenrich, the retiring president of Portland Lodge. At this meeting the charter for the Jacob Bloch Auxiliary was presented by Dr. Tilzer in behalf of the Grand Lodge.

The address of the evening was delivered by David N. Mosessohn, First Grand Vice-President, who told of the objects of the Order and pleaded for a close co-operation in the building up of the local lodges. In behalf of Portland Lodge, he presented Past President Milton Friedenrich and District Deputy M. M. Bettman with past presidents' jewels, expressing the appreciation of the members of the lodge for their untiring work in behalf of the lodge. He stated that Past President Lauterstein of Theodore Herzl Lodge received a jewel from that lodge at its last meeting.

The musical program consisted of violin solos by Miss Sylvia Weinstein, accompanied on the piano by Miss Soule, who was forced to respond to two encores so enthusiastically was she received, and the splendid baritone solos by T. O. Scougall, accompanied on the piano by Mrs. Scougall. Both numbers were well delivered.

At the close of the meeting dancing was indulged in.

Portland Lodge No. 416 held a very interesting meeting on Dec. 5, at which time three new members were initiated. Nominations of officers for the coming year were also made.

On the evening of Dec. 7 District Deputy Dr. M. M. Bettman effected temporary organization of Jacob Bloch Auxiliary, Daughters of the Covenant. On Dec. 12 permanent organization was completed. Hereafter Jacob Bloch Auxiliary will meet in a hall adjoining that in which Portland Lodge No. 416 is meeting in the B'nai B'rith building. Portland Lodge has long looked forward to the organization of a ladies' auxiliary and many pleasant joint social meetings will be held at the conclusion of the regular meetings. The organization starts with 24 charter members.

Jacob Bloch Auxiliary, Daughters of the Covenant, is named in honor of the late Rabbi Jacob Bloch, for 16 years Rabbi of Temple Beth Israel of this city and for more than 40 years an active and enthusiastic member of the B'nai B'rith.

UNITED CITIES LODGE No. 533 OF JOPLIN, MO., CELEBRATES B'NAI B'RITH DAY.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated by United Cities Lodge of Joplin, Mo., on Sunday, Dec. 10, 1916, with a program for both the afternoon and evening sessions at the Knights of Pythias Hall.

In the afternoon a regular meeting of the lodge was held and a class of fourteen candidates was initiated and nominations for the officers for the ensuing year were made. In the evening a banquet was held at which more than 200 members coming from the cities of Joplin, Galena, Pittsburgh, Webb, Carthage, Carterville and Ft. Scott, Mo., in addition to the local members, were present. Brother Harry Hurwitz presided and introduced the speakers.

Rabbi Joseph Leiser, in his talk on "The Harmony of the Synagogue and the Fraternity," said "the synagogue is the ideal forming institution; it aids in the formation of ideals and ideals governing life. According to psychology," said the speaker, "every ideal involves action, and hence the ideal must be translated into action which looks after the practical things of life, and thus the B'nai B'rith as a fraternity enters into the work by looking after the various institutions it has founded and which have proven so useful to the Jewish communities."

"Patriotism" was the subject of G. F. Newburger's talk, which he treated from the standpoint as an asset of the American Jew. He urged the new comers of the Jewish faith to appreciate the privilege of their American citizenship.

Short talks were also made by Brothers W. Fleishaber, president of the lodge; M. Scheil; M. Wiler, all of Joplin, and David Weil of Carthage, Mo.

At the meeting Mr. Samuel Davis, who will conduct the class, addressed the gathering on "Successful Salesmanship".

They referred to the ideals that the lodge stood for and promoted. Mr. William Widenthal was presented with a loving cup by the lodge in appreciation of his loyal service to the Order. In the afternoon of the same day a meeting of the lodge was held at which a large number of candidates were initiated.

Louisville Lodge is arranging to hold its B'nai B'rith Day celebration on Sunday evening, Feb. 4, 1917, in the main auditorium of the Y. M. H. A. building. Dr. David Philipson of Cincinnati will be the principal speaker of the evening. A musical program, participated in by the best talent in the city, will also be arranged. On account of the prominence and popularity of Dr. Philipson a record-breaking crowd is expected at this celebation.

Louisville Lodge is also systematically formulating plans to conduct another vigorous campaign for membership during the early part of the year, and the leaders of the lodge feel confident that the lodge will make a substantial increase in membership which will compare favorably with the increase which has been made by the various lodges in the district during the past year. The reason that the campaign was not conducted before the first of the year was on account of business conditions which up to the present time have prevented the members of the propaganda committee from giving it the necessary attention.

The plan on which the campaign will be conducted is to enlist in the campaign practically every member of the lodge and to assign to each member the names of two or three prospects which they will be expected to enroll. They will be given until a certain day to report and return their cards of applications, and then those prospects who are not obtained as members through this plan will be distributed among the active members of the propaganda committee who will call in person upon said prospects and again endeavor to get their applications.

ABRAHAM LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

The officers-elect of Abraham Lodge No. 89 of Bridgeport, Conn., were installed on Sunday, Jan. 7, 1917, by Bro. Charles Hartman of New York, a member of the Executive Committee of the Order. Congratulations and greetings were presented from Mr. Adolf Kraus of Chicago, president of the Order; Judge A. K. Cohen of Boston, president of the District Grand Lodge, and a number of other officers of the District Grand Lodge.

A noteworthy incident of the celebration was the installation of Bro. Jacob Klein, first vice-president of the Constitution Grand Lodge of the Order, as the president of the lodge, an office which he had occupied 25 years ago. President Klein was presented with a handsome ivory gavel as a token of esteem from the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge in honor of the approaching fiftieth anniversary of the existence of the lodge.

B'NAI B'RITH ACTIVITIES IN BOSTON.

Massachusetts Lodge No. 27 held a high-class Cabaret-Smoker and Collation at the Hotel Brunswick, Dec. 20, 1916.

The lodge initiated, prior to the entertainment, 19 new members, and an initiation of such a large class is nothing new to Massachusetts Lodge, as through the efforts of the officers the membership in the past year was increased thus to the amount of 400 per cent for the year.

The new members who have joined are highly enthusiastic in the interests of B'nai B'rith and the lodge has every prospect of increasing its membership tremendously and becoming one of the banner lodges of the district.

At the entertainment held there was a large attendance and the affair was thoroughly enjoyed by all those who were present, and the president, Richard Hermann, made the address of welcome.

The lodge, of which Judge A. K. Cohen, President of District No. 1, is a member, in appreciation of the honor conferred upon it by the election of the Judge to the presidency, is tendering to Bro. A. K. Cohen a banquet and testimonial on Jan. 24, 1917, at the City Club, and it is expected that this affair will be very well attended and that its influence will result in obtaining new members.

At the last meeting election of officers took place and the present incumbent, Richard Hermann, declined the presidency for another year, as he felt his duties with the institution of the Social Service Department under the auspices of the Massachusetts Lodge, as on the lines suggested by the General Committee, will take up quite a great deal of his time and no doubt it is to be expected that great work will be accomplished under his leadership in that direction.

The officers elected for the ensuing year were as follows: Jacob Wasserman, the present vice-president, being advanced to the presidency; the assistant monitor, Franklin M. Cohen, to the office of vice-president; Sumner S. Gordon, assistant monitor; Bernard Gerfinkle, inside guardian; Herman A. Mintz, warden; J. S. Phillips, secretary, and three trustees, as follows: Warren J. Bloom, Charles M. Hollander and William Reichert.

With the election of above officers, every reason is felt that the lodge will enjoy a successful year, especially where the newly-elected president is a man of vigor, enthusiasm and well thought of in the Jewish community of Boston, and his popularity was shown in his recent election to the House of Representatives.

ISAAC LODGE, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

At the luncheon given at Hotel Wisconsin under the auspices of Isaac Lodge No. 87 of Milwaukee, Wis., on Dec. 6, 1916, Miss Minnie F. Low of the Bureau of Personal Service of Chicago, former president of the National Conference of Jewish Charities, addressed the Jewish men and women of Milwaukee on the subject of "Community Service." The affair was one of a series planned by the lodge for the purpose of enlarging the interest of the Jewish people in matters of civic interest and general community betterment.

"The social workers in Chicago have done more to inject humanitarian ideals and progressive methods into state, county and city charitable institutions than in any other city that I know," said Miss Low, who enjoys the distinction of having been the first social worker in the United States and also the first women to be president of the National Conference of Jewish Charities.

"So thoroughly is their work recognized that neither state, city nor county dreams of undertaking any sort of reform or progressive movement for the care of the unfortunate without consulting the social workers. Intensive work among the cripples, study of the best treatment and care of mental defectives no matter what the question may be, the social workers are called upon for advice.

"In this all faiths and creeds and races work side by side. Every board or committee that is formed has representation from all creeds.

"Among the great works accomplished I count the introduction of private charity methods into the public boards and institutions. The private methods are 100 years in advance of public methods. The juvenile court and the mothers' pensions are two of the great achievements of the social workers."

ENTERTAINMENT BY COVENANT LODGE, DULUTH, MINN.

Minstrelsy and vaudeville were the features of the home talent entertainment staged by Covenant Lodge No. 569 of Duluth, Minn., at the Little Theater, Wednesday evening, Dec. 20.

Members of the fraternity, their families and friends, filled the playhouse long before the opening of the show, and the many song numbers and specialties were well received. The proceeds of the show will go into a special fund for furnishing B'nai B'rith lodge quarters in the new Temple Emanuel building, when it is finished next year.

The show was opened with a minstrel program, E. A. Silberstein acting as interlocutor and the following as end men: Jay Schrader, A. B. Kapplin, Charles Rosenfeld, Louis Kramer, Max Rosenfeld, and Barney N. Scott. Soloists were: Miss Bessie Meyers and Lionel Traubman, and the chorus consisted of Misses Esther Abrahamson, Rosalind Bondy, Jeanette Gomberg, Rachel Hammel, Mae Klein and Alice Wetzler.

A. B. Kapplin and Jay Schrader opened the vaudeville part with an original comedy sketch, "Big Time," written by the former, that was well received. The act was a satire on the minstrel show, the two young men discussing the players while changing clothes in their dressing room, the scene of the sketch.

"Late Again" was the name of the playlet presented by Miss Besse Meyers of Minneapolis and Lionel Traubaum, whose singing delighted the audience.

Miss Jeanette Gomberg and Charles Rosenfeld entertained with three popular dance numbers, including the new waltz, the fox trot and polka. They were compelled to respond to several encores.

The entertainment was brought to a close with "The Seminary Girls," a miniature musical comedy written by Miss Alice Wetzler and presented by six young women.

Those who took part in "The Seminary Girls" were: Miss Rosalind Bondy, the prude; Miss Alice Wetzler, her roommate, and Misses Esther Abrahamson, Jeanette Gomberg. Rae Hammel and Mae Klein, their classmates.

CLASS INITIATION BY UNIONTOWN LODGE OF UNIONTOWN, PA.

On Wednesday evening, Dec. 13, 1916, Uniontown Lodge No. 471 initiated a class of 15 candidates. The occasion proved a great success and resulted in much enthusiasm being aroused among the coreligionists of that community.

Mr. Feuchtwanger, who was first introduced, gave a very illuminating discussion of the fundamental purposes of the B'nai B'rith. His remarks elicited a great deal of attention and an equal measure of applause. Then Mr. Hemple, through whose valiant labors was lately brought into action, briefly summarized his happiness at the brilliant prospects which now lay ahead of Uniontown Lodge and urged the members to remain steadfast to their pledge. Aaron Horvitz gave a remarkably profound discourse on the history of the struggling Jews and drew a strong contrast between the present state of affairs and that which has preceded the Jews in their long history. Richard S. Rauh spoke last for the visitors and carefully outlined three distinct problems in international Jewry suggesting three possible solutions. Rabbi Shapo then gave a brief incisive address about the B'nai B'rith's growth. Over 200 men and women attended this meeting, which was acclaimed the finest of its kind recently held in Uniontown.

DENVER LODGE No. 171 OBSERVES B'NAI B'RITH DAY.

B'nai B'rith Day was observed by the lodge on Thanksgiving. An open meeting was held in the lodge rooms on that morning. Considering that only two days' notice could be given of this meeting, the attendance was very good. The hurried arrangements were made to have the opportunity of listening to Brother A. L. Levi of St. Louis, who passed through Denver on his way to Pueblo, where he was to deliver an address at a community banquet that evening.

The address of Brother Levi was full of sound thought and practical suggestions. In simple language and unassumming manner, he traced the history of the Order from its organization in New York City in 1843, stating that its main object was uniting the various elements of Jewry and drawing them together under one banner regardless from whence they came and what their mode of worship. He showed how well the Order carried out its purposes, and that it was well equipped and ready to meet the conditions of our co-religionists throughout the world. He then spoke of the specific work that is being done by the Order and its lodges, referring especially to the Anti-Defamation and Social Service work of the Order. The address presented new phases of the Order's work to many members and was well received.

A regular meeting of Reuben Lodge No. 257 of Marshall, Texas, was held on December 10th, 1916. The special order of business was the election of officers. A well attended and interesting meeting was held and plans of propaganda work was discussed.

Fort Smith Lodge No. 306, held its monthly meeting on December 10th, and elected its officers for the ensuing term. The Lodge has made arrangements for the observance of B'nai B'rith Day in the month of January, on which occasion, the President of the District, Mr. E. R. Bernstein, of Shreveport, La., will be the principal speaker.

Dr. Farber of Texarkana has been chosen to deliver the principal address at the B'nai B'rith Day celebration of the lodge in Shreveport, La.

At a well-attended meeting of Memphis Lodge No. 735, of Memphis, Tenn., held on December 10. officers for the ensuing term were nominated. The election was held at the following meeting, on Sunday, December 24th.

Progress was reported by the Social Service Committee and good results shown from the Big Brother Movement inaugurated by the Lodge.

The Lodge is arranging to hold its annual B'nai B'rith Day observance in the month of January. It was decided to extend an invitation to Rabbi Julian Miller of Chattanooga, Tenn., to deliver the oration on that day.

Solomon Schechter Lodge was instituted at Port Arthur, Texas. on Jan. 7, 1917, with a membership of 23.

At the annual meeting of Oklahoma City Lodge, No. 539, held in the month of December, officers for the ensuing year and delegates to the convention of the District Grand Lodge to be held on April 22nd, at Chattanooga, Tenn., were elected.

MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS.

under a new Shibboleth. Unity is essential if good is to result from our demonstrative gathering of the spokesmen and leaders of American Israel. A truce to all party distinctions and party susceptibilities. Otherwise a plague on both your houses."

American Jewish Chronicle, New York:

"The personnel of the recent meeting of the Congress Committee included the best representatives of all shades of Jewish thought in America. The contending factions had their ablest spokesmen, their most skillful tacticians and their most capable representatives. The majority leader was Dr. Stephen S. Wise. His eloquence as well as his parliamentary ability made him the strong man of the day.

"Adolf Kraus, grandmaster of the I. O. B. B., displayed excellent tact and parliamentary ability. It is commonly understood that he was in a strong position to force his election as permanent chairman, but understanding the importance of a unanimous vote, he subordinated his personal interests and withdrew in favor of Nathan Straus, the most popular man in the assembly. By this generous attitude, he forced Louis Marshall to follow suit. In justice to Louis Marshall be it said that he displayed great courage and dignity throughout the proceedings. Evidently he was impressed by the spirit which pervaded the meeting and by the unmistakably clear attitude of the majority on outstanding Jewish problems."

Dr. Gotthard Deutsch, in the American Israelite, Cincinnati:

"Mr. Kraus acted as chairman with the calmness of a man accustomed to handle an excited crowd, although B'nai B'rith meetings are as a rule not very exciting."

ISRAEL, THE INTERNATIONAL PEOPLE

By REV. DR. DAVID PHILIPSON

(Sermon delivered before the Convention of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations at Har Sinai Temple, Baltimore)

Never during the twoscore years and more since our Union of American Hebrew Congregations was founded by the unforgettable leader, Isaac M. Wise, and the devoted co-workers who assisted him in giving form and substance to what had been the dream of his waking and sleping hours for a quarter of a century, has this organization met in so troubled, so critical, so portentous a time in the history of the world, and the history of Jewry, as this. Though we, in this blessed land, are far away from the frightful scenes of unspeakable carnage in the devastated countries of the Old World, still we cannot get away from the influence of the world woe, nor would we. All our thinking is affected in some way or other by the crisis through which the nations are now passing. Victor Hugo once wrote that Waterloo changed the front of the universe. In a much more comprehensive sense this will prove true of the present Titanic struggle. Things will never be again quite as they were before the summer of 1914. Values will be altered. The men and women in the warring lands will have an altogether different outlook upon the temporalities and the eternities. The old order is passing for many of the embattled peoples. A new order shall dawn. The night is still black, very black, but out of the blackness light shall emerge. They who are now suffering and agonizing, they who are walking in darkness shall see a great light, the light of advancing progress, the light of liberating freedom.

Of no element of the populations of European lands will this prove more true than of our co-religionists. Because of the disabilities of the Jews in Russia and Rumania, because of the indescribable suffering, misery and woe, greater far than that of others, which they are experiencing in the Eastern war zone, notably in Poland, there are particular problems for us, as Jews, in addition to the general human problems that concern us in common with all our fellowmen.

America the Center of Jewish Life.

The center of gravity of Jewish life has shifted to America. We are witnessing a new phase of our centuried history in the making. As once Palestine was the seat of supremacy in Jewry, and then Babylon, and then Spain, and then Poland, so now it is coming to be the United States. In all truth, shechinah be-maaraba, the new revelation of God's working in Jewry is here in this Western sphere. Never has the command of God spoken more surely, or more impressively, than it is sounding in these days in ears not deaf to spiritual messages. And that word is being addressed particularly to us of the house of Israel in this land of promise of these latter days. If ever the burden of the spirit of the Lord was upon a people it is now upon us. Woe unto us if we have not vision! Woe unto us if in these new days of revelation we are not ready to say, in the words spoken by our fathers, as they faced the mount of revelation in that ancient time—naaseh wenishma! We will do and we will hear! Woe unto us if we are unmindful of the mighty responsibility which our exceptional position as citizens of this free land places upon our shoulders! Unto us our harried brethren, subjected to countless woes, are looking for succor and for counsel. In the plan of Providence the blessing and prosperity which are ours here in America are to become the instruments of salvation for our brethren. This is the latest chapter in the marvelous story which began in dim antiquity, when, in response to the driving call, lech lecha meartzecha, Abraham left his birthplace and his father's house to live for the truth which had come unto him and to become a blessing unto many nations.

The First Loss of Palestine.

Since then how frequently that command has sounded unto the descendants of Abraham at critical periods in their history! Again and again that same bidding became imperative and, whether we would or not, it had to be obeyed. It was, in all truth, the command of God, though at the time it scarcely seemed so. Thus was it in the days of the first great catastrophe, the conquest of Jerusalem by the Babylonian king and the leading of the people into captivity. Then was the people bidden to get them out of their birthplace and their father's house. But was the land to which they were transported aught but the land of trouble? Was it possible that God's blessing rested there, that God's work could be performed there, so that this departure from their land could work out for good? Indeed, it seemed not possible that this could prove to be the case. All seemed lost, the future absolutely hopeless. Exiled into a strange land, it is no wonder that the people cried out: "Our bones are dried up, our hope is lost, we are clean cut off".

And yet the years of that Babylonian sojourn were fraught with tremendous consequences for Judaism. It was then that it became clear that the spirit of Judaism could flourish even away from Palestine, that the truth was not dependent upon any soil, however dear or sacred. Then it was that the synagogue, as the house of prayer, came into being, and the conviction was brought home to the people that, although the Temple of Jerusalem was destroyed, God could still be approached in these houses of prayer in this strange land. Then it was that the universal ideas in Judaism were strengthened and fostered—the universal ideas that culminated in the remarkable speeches of that soaring genius, the prophet of the close of that period of the Babylonian exile, the man whose name we do not even know, but whose glorious messages of consolation, forming the latter portion of our present Biblical Book of Isaiah, are among the world's supreme religious masterpieces. For this mighty spirit God was God not only of Israel but of all nations. Israel, it is true, is God's chosen; but chosen for what? For service. In these speeches it is that we find the famous conception of Israel as the ebed Adonay, the servant of the Lord. Through the suffering in the exile Israel advanced in the scale of spiritual power and might. This universal idea of the true inwardness of Israel's work in the world, wherever it might be, to serve in the cause of God's truth, is presented time and again in the pages of this Babylonian Jew. Through all the dark days of which Israel's history is so full his words have brought hope and peace to unnumbered generations. The words of his message of consolation were an ever-present enheartenment in the wretchedness and misery that were Israel's portion—"Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God", "fear not, my servant Jacob", "fear ye not, nor be afraid". Israel as the Messiah of the nations, Israel as a priest people, destined to serve humanity through suffering and travail; this is the mighty contribution to our religous treasure trove by this our prophet. The Christian church, of course, interpreted, and interprets all these noted "servant of the Lord" passages in the light of prophecies, foretelling the career of Jesus of Nazareth. But this is a forced interpretation; as has been well said, the burden of the thought of our prophet is that not one Jew, but the Jew, not one individual, but the Jewish people, is the suffering and, finally, the achieving servant of the Lord.

The going forth of the people from their father's house, from land and birthplace into exile, had thus resulted into a mighty advance of spiritual potency. The palpable proof was here given that God could be worshiped everywhere, that God revealed himself everywhere, that Israel could serve God even beyond the confines of the Temple of Jerusalem and the boundaries of Palestine. What an intimation of a greater future was this, what a forecast of that which was still to be!

The Final Loss of Palestine.

Centuries later, in an even greater crisis, that call, "Get thee out of thy land", came again to the people of Israel. Six hundred years and more had elapsed since the first destruction of Jerusalem when the second catastrophe befell. During those six centuries, it is true, the people had been widely scattered throughout the then civilized world, in Asiatic countries, in African lands, in European provinces, as far west as Spain. But the Temple of Jerusalem was the center of Jewish life; thither all eyes were directed at times of prayer as towards the holiest spot where God dwelt especially. The priesthood that served in that Temple served for all Israel. Israel, far flung over the earth, sent its contributions for the upkeep of Temple, priesthood and sacrificial system.

When the dire blow fell, and the edifice became a prey to the devouring flames, when the Romans finally conquered the Holy City and took the Jewish people captive, it seemed to many that the end of all things had come.

Was it the voice of God which now again sounded the command to leave land and birthplace and father's house to go out into a larger world to become a blessing? Again, as more than six centuries before, this seemed not possible. Few were they who could see God's larger purpose unfolding in this terrible crisis. But here and there great teachers saw the silver lining in the black cloud. The leading rabbi of the time, a mighty spirit, Rabbi Jochanan ben Zakkai, comforted his weeping pupils and colleagues as they bewailed the loss of Temple, and altar, and sacrifice with the well-known words that one altar in Israel was not destroyed—the performance of good deeds; and he bade them go forth into their various spheres of activity and serve. Again the great idea of service. The words of the rabbi to his pupils were applicable to the larger life of the whole people.

The Universalism of Israel's Mission.

Israel was to begin that career of service and travail as the servant of the Lord in all the world. Even to a greater degree than in Babylon, after the first destruction, was the idea of universalism to be stressed. The service of the hereditary priesthood at the altar had come to a close. Of course, the hope was constant that this service had been only suspended and would be re-established when, some day, the Temple would be rebuilt and the sacrifices again brought. But, for all practical purposes, the priesthood idea was transferred to the whole people. The rabbi, the teacher, who might issue from any home or family in Israel—truly representative of the democratic idea of the service of the whole people—took as the religious leader, the place of the priest, the representative of a hereditary religious aristocracy. Thus only in another way, because of changed circumstances, was the great thought of Isaiah of Babylon, that the people of Israel was the servant of the Lord, being worked out.

Israel in the World.

In other words, when Temple and land and birthplace were lost, the Messianic mission of Israel among the peoples of the world commenced. As Abraham's greater work began when he left his land and birthplace, as the larger significance of Israel's work became emphasized by the sojourn in Babylon upon leaving land and birthplace after the first destruction, so was it accentuated even more strongly after the passing of this greatest crisis in its life. Dark was the outlook; it did, indeed, seem to that generation that the glory had departed altogether from Israel. And yet, as we now see after the event, this was but a further step in the progress of Israel's Messianic service. The Temple of Jerusalem was lost; but shrines unto the living God of Israel arose everywhere in the civilized world during the succeeding centuries, since Israel penetrated everywhere. The priesthood of a single family gave way to the idea of the priesthood of a whole people in a reality, if not in name. God was being worshiped everywhere in reality by Israel, with the Temple of Jerusalem only a memory. So unconsciously, perhaps, but none the less surely, the conceptions of the universalism of God's presence everywhere, and the universalism of Israel's service everywhere, became deeply imbedded as century after century passed, and Israel assumed the character of an international, a universal religious community.

All this was preparing for the coming of a day when there would be proclaimed again the mighty preachments of the prophet of the captivity and the universal interpretation of Israel's work in the world would be held forth, of Israel's Messianic service as a priest people, dispersed and scattered everywhere, not as a curse for the sins of the fathers, but to realize the purposes of God in sending the people forth from land and home and birthplace, that, through it, the families of the earth should be blessed. This was little apparent in the medieval European lands, where Israel dwelt in ghettos and wore the badges of shameful discrimination, when whole communities were mobbed and plundered, tortured and exiled. In Zangwill's expressive phrase, the lands of Europe were stepfatherlands to the Jew. The ghetto became Israel's birthplace and home. What wonder that, under such circumstances, the universal phase of this people's purpose was little recognized!

The New Era.

But this darkness was only the precursor of a brilliant dawn. God's spirit was working mightily in the world and, when the measure of the days was full, the new day broke at the close of the eighteenth century. Then again sounded the command to Israel: "Get thee out of thy land and birthplace and home", out of the abodes of oppression in all lands, out of the ghettos that have been thy birthplace and thy home, get thee out of these into the abodes which I shall show thee, the abodes of freedom and opportunity, in America and other lands of freedom where the new light is beginning to shine. Again was there a crisis in the history of Israel more significant than any that had gone before. In those new abodes of freedom the universal ideas and ideals which had lain dormant in the evil days of oppression were to take on new and larger life. Isaiah of Babylon and all similar spirits were to live again, for the beginning of the end of the great captivity had come, the captivity of ghetto and disability. That prophet was again speaking, and the people were heeding: "Remember ye not the former things, neither consider the days of old; behold I do a new thing; now shall it spring forth, shall ye not know it?"

Israel, the International People.

Indeed, a new thing was occurring, a revolutionary turn was being taken in the life of the age-old international people of Israel; and the particularly new thing was that this internationalism was to be demonstrated and emphasized as never before. Israel among the nations in medieval days, until the dawn of the new era of freedom, had been unrecognized as having any rights. Israel among the nations in the newer days was to stand forth as a component element of the nations, into whose fellowship the individual members of the house of Israel were to be received in the full dignity of citizenship. Jews in religion—Americans, Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, as the case might be, in nationality—became the motto describing the status of the international people of Israel among the nations of the world. This was the new birth of the new time for the children of Israel. It was a new reading of the idea and ideal of universalism.

True, Philo of Alexandria had written, eighteen hundred years previously, concerning his co-religionists: "The Jews consider the Holy City as the metropolis because the Temple of the highest God is there, but they look upon the land where their fathers lived as their fatherland, having been born and reared there." However, these words of the great Jewish neo-Platonic philosopher became a dead letter during the centuries of Christian persecution of the Jews owing to their servile position in the states of Europe. The Jews were the international religious people in potentiality only, not in actuality. They were international in fact, for they lived among all the nations; but they had no participation in the national life. It was an anomalous condition. Beneath the surface it bore the promise and potency of great things, but few, if any, who lived in those terrible days of repression and disability could have recognized the possibilities that a brighter and better day would develop into undreamed-of actualities. The material for the real universal internationalism was all there. It required only the spark of the divine fire of freedom to set that material aflame and cause it to burst forth in the eyes of all the world into a great new thing, comparable with, aye, superior to, the glorious event that the ancient prophet had designated by this name. Once again Israel was heeding the divine call to get itself forth into the world and to live a new life among the nations of the world. Once again the Lord was doing wondrous things, even as in the days of old. The bonds of the oppressor were broken and the days of exile had come to a close, the Messiah, the spirit of a new age, was coming; and Israel, now no longer a passive sufferer in the ghettos of the old world of bondage and ill-usage, but an active participant in the glorious life of the new world of light and freedom, went forth to serve everywhere in the ranks of justice and right, of brotherhood and humanity, the messenger of the glad tidings of the universal fatherhood of God unto those who could really appreciate the significance of the marvelous events that the new time had brought to pass.

Universalism in the Nineteenth Century.

It is not necessary to rehearse the special phenomena that exemplified the ushering in of the new life of the Jews and emphasized their status as the international people among the nations of all of which separate members of this people formed a part. State after state in Western Europe, to say nothing of our own blessed land, granted them the full rights of citizenship with the passing of the years of the nineteenth century. Within Israel itself arose the reform movement, which interpreted the new life in the terms of the universalism of the ancient prophets, notably Isaiah of Babylon. In burning word and eloquent preachment modern prophets in Israel dwelt upon the mission of this people as atem eday witnesses of God everywhere, as the priest people that was set free in these latter days to serve God everywhere, as the international religious community that was to furnish the palpable proof that stronger and loftier than all artificial nationalisms that are of man's devising are the universal bonds that are of God's making. Israel was thus, in all truth, a symbol of what seemed to be the great overpowering fact in mankind's life in that nineteenth century. Great scientific discoveries, remarkable inventions that brought the most distant parts of the earth into close touch with one another, treaties of peace and arbitration among the nations—all seemed to give point to the growing dominance of the idea of universalism whereof Israel's status as an international religious community was the outstanding symbol. It appeared as though this was the dawn of that brilliant day prophesied of old when the nations were to flock together to the house of the [illegible] God, when swords were to be beaten into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks and nations were not to learn war any more.

The Reaction.

But the time was not yet ripe. Signs of evil [illegible] on the horizon. [illegible] all [illegible] Anti-Semitism in Germany [illegible] at uni- [illegible] The [illegible] grew by what it fed on: class hatreds, racial hatreds—all these were stirred up until, finally, the frightful conflagration that is consuming the old world burst forth in its terrible intensity. Many see in this the ruin of all the hopes built upon the prophetic visions of universalism and brotherhood. A note of weariness and hopelessness sounds forth in all the lands. Within our own narrower sphere the wheel seems to have come around full circle. Thousands and tens of thousands have thrown up their hands in despair. We protagonists of universalism are being laughed to scorn. Our claim that Israel is an international religious community is being held up to ridicule.

The New Nationalism.

We are told that Israel can only survive by stressing its separatistic nationalism, that only by drawing ourselves off from our fellow-inhabitants in the lands in which we live as a separate nationalistic group can we perpetuate Jewish life. The religion of Israel is said by these latter-day prophets of nationalism to be only an incident, and that, too, a small incident, say ten per cent of the general Jewish experience, which they term Hebraism. In a word, because of the madness which has come upon the world, because of anti-Semitism and nationalistic obsessions and hatreds, and Russian and Rumanian anti-Jewish excesses, we are bidden reverse our entire viewpoint of the international universalism of Israel's place among the nations and to accept as the final explanation of Israel's marvelous travail of the ages of the excision of the religious internationalism as the supreme factor in the life of this people, and substitute for it, as its reason for being, an excluding and exclusive nationalism that would make Israel merely like any other small people, like Montenegro, or Albania, or Afghanistan, or Santo Domingo, and not goy echad baaretz, a people unique, a people unexampled in its history and its preservation, in its message and its mission. But that we will not do.

The Principles of the Union.

We here being a convention of a Union of Congregations base upon the religious signicance of Israel's life. Let nationalists aver that the religious element is only an incident of Jewish experience, say ten per cent, we internationalists founding our claim on what has been Israel's task in the world from the day that it was bidden be a kingdom of priests and a holy people, fashioning our interpretation along the line of Israel's geniuses among its prophets, thinkers, sages, rabbis and martyrs, the beginning and the end of whose life and thought was God, and God alone, taking our stand on the religious idealistic interpretation of history, whereof we believe Israel presents the most striking symbol, as over against the materialistic interpretation, whereof the present war, the apothesis of nationalism is the climax, we internationalists I say, despite all the frightfully distressing days through which we are passing, must hold our rudder true, feeling that, as so often before, the darkness which is enveloping the world will be dissipated and the mists disappear before a re-arising sun.

Our Outlook for the Future.

Dark was the prospect when the first Temple was destroyed and Israel led captive to Babylon, but from out of that darkness came forth the briliant light of that truth that God could be worshiped in Babylon, as well as Palestine, and eventually the great teachings of the universalistic prophet who hailed the coming of the day when God would be acknowledged one everywhere and his name one. Darker still was the outlook for Israel when Palestine was finally lost, and Temple and priesthood went the way of all things earthly; for eighteen centuries that darkness, more or less thick, brooded over Israel on all the earth, with only occasional gleams of brightness here and there, now in Babylon, now in Spain, but during that long period of darkness the plans of God, in whose sight a thousand years are only as the yesterday which is past, were unfolding and, in what we call the opening of the modern era, the glorious light again broke forth, and Israel went forth the bearer of the universalism of God's truth among all the nations, at home everywhere on God's earth where freedom, the new Messiah, had prepared the way and taken the stumbling blocks out of the path of the people. And today, when over many nations has settled a darkness thicker possibly than ever before, when over Israel as part and parcel of the nations the darkness is hanging, denser possibly in some ways than over any others, we will lift our eyes with faith and hope that help cometh from the Lord. The same God who bade Abraham go forth and be a blessing, the same God who revealed Himself through Israel as the universal God and Father of mankind, the same God who dispersed our fathers throughout the world to be a blessing unto the nations and has preserved us to this day as a people not like other peoples of the earth, but distinct, peculiar in that His word is the lamp to our feet and the light to our path, that same God in the same voice of bidding that has sounded so constantly unto Israel throughout the ages bids us of this latest day and generation to get oursceves out of our narrow confines of doubt and despair, out into the wide regions of faith that all will be well; that voice bids us as universal messengers of a universal God to sound the universal note of Israel's true place among the nations librit am leor goyim as God's covenant people, missioned by Him to be the light of the nations. Amen!

Jewish Gymnasium at Jaffa

The Jaffa Hebrew Gymnasium is maintaining its existence in spite of prevailing conditions and the great difficulties attending these. However, its activities are somewhat curtailed, the institution having only 446 students and 27 teachers. The students who graduated this last term were not given any final examinations, but certificates were issued to them on the basis of their year's work. All the graduates entered the school for officers at Constantinople. Recently the Turkish inspector of education in Palestine, Gemmal Bey, visited the gymnasium and once more expressed his extreme satisfaction at the excellent results obtained by this institution.

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE No. 5

With the full attendance of delegates present, the first business session of the 43rd annual convention of District Grand Lodge No. 5, was held on Sunday morning, Jan. 21, 1917, in the Auditorium of the Jefferson Club, Richmond, Va.

The meeting was called to order by the President, Mr. Milton Klein, of Atlanta, Ga., and prayer was offered by Rabbi Frank Rosenthal, of Columbus, Ga.

Mr. Charles Hutzler, President of Rimmon Lodge No. 68, of Richmond, Va., welcomed the delegates and officers on behalf of the city and the lodge, and brief responses were made by the President of the District, Mr. Klein, and Mr. Victor Kriegshaber, of Atlanta, President of the Hebrew Orphans' Home of that city, an institution founded and maintained by the members of the Order in the District. The morning session was taken up with the presentation of reports of the officers, including the message of the President, which contained an account of his administration of the affairs of the District during the past year. The President's message, as well as the reports of the Secretary and Treasurer, showed the District to be in fine condition.

The various reports were referred to standing committees for their consideration.

At noon a recess was taken for luncheon, which was served at the Jefferson Club, the delegates and officers being guests of the local lodge.

During the afternoon no formal session of the Grand Lodge was held, the time being utilized by the various committees for the consideration of reports submitted to them, as well as various measures and propositions presented at the morning session.

Public Meeting at Temple.

In the evening a great outpouring of members of the Order and their friends assembled at Temple Beth Ahabah. Mr. Charles Hutzler, in calling the gathering to order, presented as chairman of the evening, Dr. Edward N. Calisch, a Rabbi of Richmond, and member of the Executive Committee of the Order. Dr. Calisch, in his brief introductory remarks, gave an exposé of the aims and objects of the Order. He presented to the audience as the first speaker, Rabbi Louis Bernstein, of St. Joseph, Mo. Dr. Bernstein, in his address, emphasized as one of the principal aims of the Order the granting of succor to distressed co-religionists wherever situated.

"While the war clouds are still dark", said Rabbi Bernstein, "there is reason to look forward to the day of peace that cannot be so far away. Out of the maelstrom of destruction, he said, there may yet rise a reconstructed social order in which every human being shall be free. The Jews of this country", he said, "have sacredly imposed upon them the duty to unite and make themselves ready to lay before the peace conferences to come their plea for the emancipation of those of their brethren who still stagger under the burden of oppression".

The Chairman then presented, in eulogistic and very complimentary terms, the principal speaker of the evening, Honorable Simon Wolf, Washington, D. C., who selected "Our Duty" as the subject of his address.

He discussed the several aspects of duty as it relates to the Jew in America—his duty to the country, to his religion, to the Order of B'nai B'rith, which, he said, stands for applied Judaism in its highest form.

"I want to say to you here what I have said many times before—this country, and no other, is the Jerusalem of the future", said Mr. Wolf. "Here we must develop a Judaism, nurtured in the full freedom afforded by our great Democratic institutions, whose teachings and whose influence will bear to the world such a compelling message of liberality and brotherhood that there will be an end for all time to the injustice and the hatred and the misunderstanding that is so much with us now".

Israel As Mediator for the Oppressed.

"From this land of the free must go forward the great influence that will in the end bring to our oppressed brethren across the seas the liberty and justice of which they stand so much in need. Not only in behalf of his own brethren must the American Jew be the mediator. He must be also the mediator for all oppressed peoples and must remain so until justice, right and happiness prevail throughout the world."

The program also included a number of musical numbers, which were exceedingly well rendered.

After the benediction, by Rabbi S. Mendelssohn, of Wilmington, N. C., a reception was held during which refreshments were served.

Monday Sessions.

On Monday morning at 10 o'clock the convention resumed its business after prayer by Dr. Rosenthal. A number of reports of the standing committees were presented, discussed and disposed of.

A spirited debate at the morning session centered about the attitude of the Order to the bill, which provides a literacy test for admittance to the United States. The discussion was wholly on the question of policy, since, as was pointed out by several speakers, the proposed law contains little that will militate against the Jewish refugee, knowledge of Hebrew or Yiddish being held by the act to be sufficient for qualification under the literacy provision. Practically all immigrant Jews are versed in one or both of these languages.

The bill was attacked on the general ground that a literacy test is unsound and unscientific as a method of determining the potential value of the stranger knocking at the gate. Some of the greatest Americans of today, it was pointed out, were once themselves "undesirable" aliens, from the standpoint of the literacy test, or sons and daughters of illiterates.

At the end of the discussion the delegates voted for a resolution memorializing their representatives in Congress to oppose the passage of the bill. The following telegram was ordered sent to the members who voted against the measure in the Senate:

"At a convention of American citizens, members of the International Order of B'nai B'rith, it was unanimously resolved to congratulate you and your colleagues who voted against the immigration bill, and to urge your further opposition, because of the un-American restriction involved in the literacy test."

During the afternoon session, various resolutions were adopted, among them one approving the work of the Anti-Defamation League, a branch organization of the Order, in its campaign against the defamation of the Jew, and it was urged that this activity of the Order be strengthened and furthered by the co-operation of the lodges of the District and its members.

Social service work of the Order inaugurated on national basis at the last convention of the Order held in San Francisco, received careful consideration and met with the undivided approval of all the delegates. The convention went on record strongly supporting this work and emphasizing the necessity and need thereof so as to safeguard the rights of the Jews in this land. The lodges were urged to become actively engaged in this activity of the Order and to interest themselves, the main object to be obtained, namely, that of maintaining the good name of the Jew.

A spirited discussion arose in connection with the consideration of that part

B'NAI B'RITH OF GERMANY

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 8, held in Berlin, Nov. 7, 1916, Brother Grand President Timendorfer occupied the chair. In opening the meeting he paid a warm tribute to the memory of two recently deceased ex-presidents, Brother Lahnstein of Wiesbaden, and Bro. Adolf Schneck of Ratibor, who were excellent men, useful citizens and faithful members of the Order.

Having received the information that Brother Israel, a member of Zion Lodge, died a heroic death, the Grand Lodge inquired of Zion Lodge whether the departed left a family. The Grand Lodge received the answer that a wife and four children survive him. At the same time Zion Lodge also informed the Grand Lodge about the following procedure of the lodge when a brother dies:

"The President at once names a committee of three brethren who stand close to the family or are befriended with it. It is the duty of this committee to put themselves in communication with the widow and to assist her with advice as well as to submit propositions to the lodge in case the family is in need of help. The committee has also the duty to place 250 marks at the disposal of the widow. In order to cover these donations of 250 marks to each widow of a deceased brother the lodge puts aside 4 marks annually from the annual dues of its members. This money is booked under the special account of 'Widow's Fund'".

The Executive Committee took notice of this arrangement with great satisfaction.

Fraternitas Lodge of Dresden inquired whether it should pay 600 marks due to a boarding school for board and tuition up to Jan. 15, 1917, of two Roumanian girls, daughters of a former lodge president in Roumania, who are at the boarding school in Dresden and are cut off from communication with their relatives. The lodge wishes to know whether the Grand Lodge will pay part of this expenditure and whether the lodge shall continue to take care of the two girls from Jan. 15, in hope that the Roumanian Grand Lodge and the German Grand Lodge will eventually reimburse it.

It was resolved to inform Fraternitas Lodge that there is no objection whatever to the giving of assistance to Roumanian Jews in Germany; that under the supposition that Fraternitas Lodge has thoroughly investigated the facts in the case and is ready to contribute a corresponding amount to the 600 marks, the Grand Lodge of Germany is willing to assume a part of the cost, in case the Roumanian Grand Lodge should not be in the position to do it. The Executive Committee recommends to Fraternitas Lodge to establish communication between the relatives and the girls in Dresden through the American consulate This may obviate the taking care of the girls by Fraternitas Lodge after Jan. 15. 1917.

The members of District No. 8 are anxious to have the sectarian war statistics, the material collected by the Jews that shows the number of Jews participating in the war, published at once. The brethren desire that the Grand Lodge should interest itself in the matter. The Grand President assures the lodges that the Union of German Jews which has this matter in hand, is attending to it and if not interfered with will soon complete its work to the satisfaction of all. The result will be published in the Monthly Reports of the Grand Lodge.

Upon the inquiry of a lodge as to what stand it is to take towards a brother who has contracted a mixed marriage, the Executive Committee resolved to answer as follows: The report of the Grand President presented in the Grand Lodge session of November, 1913, explained that to a circular sent out to the lodges in regard to this question a number of German lodges answered that they do not see in the entrance of a brother into a mixed marriage any reason for his expulsion from the lodge, provided that the children of such mixed marriage are to remain Jews. Accordingly the lodges are in so far sovereign that they can judge each case separately, according to the circumstances, whether a brother can remain their member or not. In the case of a brother who, notwithstanding the fact that he entered into a mixed marriage, still remains true to Judaism and gives the assurance that he will retain his children in Judaism, the laws of the Order do not demand that he shall be expelled from his lodge. In such a case it should be considered that perhaps by expelling him from the lodge he may be induced to become more estranged from Judaism, while his continuing to remain a member of the lodge may contribute to keeping him and his children tied to Judaism. The membership in the lodge and the consequent respect for the lodge growing out of his membership has often shown itself to be a strong cement to Judaism.

While no positive instruction based upon the organic law of the Order can be given by the Grand Lodge to the lodges, there can be no doubt that we see in mixed marriages a danger to Judaism, especially when a brother leads, or intends to lead his minor children to Christianity he cannot remain in the lodge and should be expelled.

For the matter of tact and for the sake of establishing an example, lodges at elections should consider such a brother who entered into a mixed marriage ineligible for office.

Through the mediation of Bro. Paul Enge, of the Deutsche Reichs Lodge, the Society of Gratitude to Invalids sent 600 marks to the Grand Lodge. Upon motion it was resolved to turn 500 marks of this sum into the war welfare fund and to give 100 marks to the Story foundation.

A list of names of a number of B'nai B'rith and of their relatives who received medals and crosses for bravery and for valuable service, was submitted to the General Committee and read with great satisfaction.

Also a list of speakers who are willing to deliver lectures in the lodges was read and approved.

Brother Grand Vice-President officiated at a meeting of the Executive Committee held in Berlin, Dec. 19, 1916.

The Executive Committee adopted a list of visits to be made by the members of the General Committee to the lodges of the District during the time of the war.

A respite was granted to a lodge for the payment of dues for two members, one of whom is missing and the other is in captivity.

To the inquiry of Berthold Auerbach Lodge, of Berlin, whether it is advisable to admit to membership in the lodge a Russian subject who was born in Wilna and lives at present in Berlin, the Executive Committee decided to inform the lodge that it is advisable to wait with the initiation of the candidate until peace has been concluded.

Upon the proposition of a number of lodges that the Grand Lodge extend the relief of the widows and their deceased members, which it has practiced till now, for a longer space of time, the Executive Committee expressed the willingness to prolong this relief work for six months more.

Mendelssohn Lodge, of Magdeburg, demurred against a resolution passed at a previous meeting of the Executive Committee in which it was stated that the Grand Lodge considers it improper to elect brethren to office who live in a state of mixed marriage. Mendelssohn Lodge argued that by declaring such brethren ineligible to hold office they could easily be stamped as second-class members. It was decided to inform Mendelssohn Lodge that the Executive Committee maintains its standpoint, but this does not limit the freedom of the individual lodges to act according to their own judgment.

An appropriation of 100 marks was made in favor of a widow in Schaulen, to aid her to start in business and earn a living.

Upon the request of the Executive Committee the B'nai B'rith Hospital Train was transferred to the stage of the Bug army by which the train will have the opportunity to come more often to Berlin.

DOMICILE OF JEWS RESTRICTED.

The Prefect of Moscow issued an order withdrawing from the local Jewish Committee the right of presenting petitions on behalf of Jewish refugees engaged in work of national importance, to remain in the ancient capital. A thorough examination was ordered of the certificates of Jewish war workers who had previously been allowed to stay in Moscow. The Prefect, however, directed that ailing Jews or those permanently settled at Moscow should not be disturbed.

The Real Russians in Moscow sent a petition to the Ministry complaining of the alleged successful efforts of Jews in purchasing a large number of residences in the ancient capital and asking the government to take steps to stop this new danger.

The New Translation of the Scriptures

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

The long expected and long delayed new Translation of the Hebrew Scriptures is at last out and by this time in the hands of thousands of people. It is open to the inspection of everybody, friend and foe alike. Captious criticism will make itself nugatory. There will naturally folow honest attempts to estimate its character and its merits. A certain degree of intimacy is requisite for such appraisal. The Translation will be compared with its predecessors. A deep study of all its features only will yield adequate judgment. As one who had a share in what is the joint production of a body of seven men, I venture in all objectivity and candor to tell our poeple what its salient characteristics are.

There have been English translations of our Scriptures done by Jews for Jews. The need of Bible versions is an ancient one. In Palestine it became necessary so soon as the Hebrew ceased to be a spoken language. Elsewhere the need repeated itself, keeping pace with the dispersion of our people. Whithersoever we went, we took our Scriptures with us. We preserved the original. We cherished a knowledge of the sacred tongue. But the fact none the less was manifest that a substantial portion of our people had not sufficient knowledge to read the Scriptures in the original. Our spiritual guides saw to it that the Word of God should be understood by all classes. The women—in those days when with few exception the doors of education were shut to them—and the unlettered had the Scriptures presented to them in the language they spoke and best understood. Thus there have been translations into the Aramaic, the Greek, the Arabic, the Spanish, the Persian, and so on, not to forget the Judeo-German. With the entrance of the Jew into modern life subsequent to the breaking down of the ghetto—or in the first stages preparatory to it—translations into the various tongues of Europe multiplied. English-speaking Jewry produced notable translations wholly or in part by such men as Delgado, Newman, Benish, Kalisch, Friedlander, and last, not least, in this country by Leeser. Leeser's single-handed effort was noteworthy indeed. He anticipated in many respects the Anglican revision of 1886, though both based themselves on the Anglican version of 1611, that masterpiece of English style.

A translation of the Scriptures has naturally two sides to it. On the one hand it must be an adequate rendition of the original. That requires a painstaking familiarity with all that has been done and said and written in the way of elucidating the original. The work of a genius, even when composed in our own language, the language we speak in the home and study at school, requires a commentary to make it thoroughly understood. We may enjoy Shakespeare in an edition of the bare text. But we are sure to pass over many nicer points which the student who has made Shakespeare his specialty, who is at home in the whole range of his writings and his thought, is alone capable of discerning. Certainly this must be the case with a work in a foreign language, in an ancient language. The Bible is in everybody's hands. The commonest and meanest may derive profit, spiritual edification, from reading its bare text. But then it must not be forgotten that we read it for the most part in a translation, and a translation is a sort of commentary. For the principal merit of a translation is that it is intelligible. Where the original is capable of more than one meaning, it must choose the one most likely; and where the original is obscure, it must, nevertheless, seek to make sense. Now, the literature in which the Bible is explained is naturally stupendous. There has been a growth in our knowledge of the Bible. One day teaches the other. He who makes claim to being a student of the Bible, a specialist, must acquaint himself with the oldest and the latest, with the first and last word about the Bible meaning. And so it naturally happens that a translation which was adequate in one generation becomes antiquated in the next. Some have been executed with more than ordinary diligence and have survived for hundreds of years. Leeser, for instance, made ample use of the materials before him. But he would have been the last to call himself a Bible specialist. He made good use of the two German translations prepared at the end of the eighteenth and in the first half of the nineteenth century. Since then there has been a notable progress in Bible study. We have had three great commentators from our own ranks, men who have commanded and still command the attention of the scholarly world. It remained for us of this latter day to incorporate into our translation those great achievements. And for that reason we believe that our version is destined to live longer.

The second feature of a translation of the Scriptures is that it must be a literary piece of work in the language in which it appears. It is not enough for the translator to reproduce the meaning of the original, but he must do so without doing violence to the genius of the language into which the translation is made. He must aim at a diction which is elegant, as it befits so noble a product of literary grace as is the original. Now the translator into English must for all times to come base himself on the Anglican version of 1611, the so-called King James version. Itself a revision of many efforts that preceded it, it struck a happy medium between slavish literalness and diffuse paraphrase. It followed the letter only too often and enriched the English language with many phrases which are Hebrew in an English coloring. Yet these expressions have become part and parcel of the English language. The best writers in English have acknowledged their indebtednes to the English Bible. On the other hand they knew how to let go a crude rendition of the letter in favor of an idiomatic phrase in English which only thus reveals the beauty of the original. Moreover, the translators of 1611 understood how to use "great helps". There is not a line in this version which may not be traced to some Jewish commentator of the Middle Ages. Still they made mistakes on the side of meaning. And all that the modern student has to do is to give the truer meaning, but in language which stands on a par with the diction of the Bible of 1611. This feature was not altogether successfully carried out by our predecessors. And it is the merit of this newer translation that it is thoroughly English in diction.

All of which was done with the utmost fidelity, not only to the letter, or rather the intent, of the original, but also to Jewish tradition. It cannot be repeated too often that the English translations of 1611 and 1886 are Anglican, Christian. They were intended for use in the churches, while ours is to be used in the synagogue and in the Jewish school and home. We Jews speak English, but we are not Anglicans. It is true, the chapter headings of the older version which make the Scriptural word refer to things Christian, have been done away with in the later version of 1886. But there remain renderings which are Christian in spirit. They have been given up by the Christian scholar, but the church still clings to them. Naturally they have no place in a Jewish translation, prepared by Jews for Jews. But this is only a negative merit. Our translation is positively Jewish in its every line. We have consulted Jewish interpretation, Jewish commentators of all ages. Of course, we accepted the truth, no matter what its source was. The student will find that here and there we adopted an interpretation from outsiders, simply because it commended itself to us as the truth. But in the main it has been our experience that many of the so-called innovations were long ago anticipated by Jewish scholars. It was a question of industrious study, and our body was composed of men who excelled in the knowledge of Jewish sources.

The neatly printed volume is now before the public. It is an emblem of the Jew's double heritage in these lands of the English tongue and civilization. The garb is English, and a pure English it is. The spirit is Jewish to the core. It was produced in no haste. And that is why we predict for it longevity. It will win its friends beyond the inner circles of Jewry on this continent is divided. The impulse to go back to the Book, aye, even to the original. It has been the product of the two camps into which Jewry on this continent is didived. The joint labor has cemented them. They may have had their differences at the start. That these differences were composed, the consummation eloquently testifies. The translation has yielded as a by-product, as it were, the object lesson that in things essential we are one. May the unification of the two camps in other and similar enterprises proceed apace. And peace be to Israel!

Every man, however good he may be, has a still better man dwelling in him which is properly himself, but to whom nevertheless, he is often unfaithful.—Humboldt.

Union of American Hebrew Congregations

Twenty-fifth Biennial Council

Many notables, Jewish men and women prominent in communal affairs, gathered in Baltimore to attend the twenty-fifth council of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations on Monday, January 15, 1917.

Monday's Sessions.

The morning and afternoon were devoted to meetings of the Executive Board at the Hotel Belvedere, the convention headquarters. The various boards and committees presented reports, which were submitted to the delegates at the sessions on Tuesday.

The meetings of the Union were opened by a religious service at the Har Sinai Temple on Bolton Street. A large assembly of visitors and local residents thronged the edifice. Dr. David Philipson of Cincinnati delivered the sermon. The service closed with a prayer by Dr. Kaufman Kohler, president of the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati.

Tuesday's Sessions.

On Tuesday morning the Council met to transact business. Mr. Simon D. Burgunder of Baltimore, was chosen temporary chairman. Mr. Lipman Levi, who had been the secretary of the Union for many years, was re-elected secretary. Mr. Eli Frank, one of the prominent members of the Baltimore bar, delivered the address of welcome.

The principal feature of the morning session was the report of the President, Mr. J. Walter Freiberg.

The President's message reviewed the work of the last two years. It dwelt upon the remarkable growth of the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati.

Mr. Freiberg dwelt upon the unusual success of the Department of Synagogue and School Extension—an entirely new departure in Jewish church circles, dealing with home mission work, publication of religious text-books, education of scattered groups of Jews by correspondence and all the varied activities usually undertaken by several boards in other denominational bodies.

Mr. Freiberg bespoke the continued interest of the Union in the work of the Tract Commission, the Board of Editors of Jewish Religious Literature, the Superannuated Ministers' Fund, the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods and recommended several changes in the constitution. The climax of his report was the recommendation to raise $3,000,000 for the continuation of these many enterprises.

Tuesday Afternoon.

Tuesday afternoon's session was given up to a consideration of the religious problem of the young man and the young woman. The discussion was led by Dr. Jacob H. Hollander, Professor of Political Economy, Johns Hopkins University, who delivered an address on "How to Attract Young People to the Synagogue".

The discussion was participated in by many rabbis and laymen. The discussion crystallized in a resolution to organize a "Federation of Young People's Organizations", whose purpose it shall be to stimulate and standardize the work of this description.

Banquet Tuesday Evening.

More than 600 delegates attended the banquet at the Hotel Belvedere on Tuesday evening. The president of the Hebrew Union College, Dr. Kaufman Kohler, pronounced grace. Mr. Siegmond B. Sonneborn acted as toastmaster. Among the speakers who helped to make the banquet successful were Mr. J. Walter Freiberg, who spoke on "The Status of the Union"; Mr. Charles Shohl, "Home Missions"; Mr. Edward L. Heinsheimer of Cincinnati, president of the Board of Governors of the Hebrew Union College, "The College"; Hon. Simon Wolf, "Jewish Immigration and the War", and Mr Jacob H. Schiff, "Jews in Europe and America". Rabbi Martin A. Meyer, of San Francisco, discussed "The Jewish Conditions in the Far West", and Mrs. Abram Simon, president of the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, gave a brilliant talk on "The Position of Woman in Congregational Work". Rabbi William Rosenau, president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, spoke of the work of "The Central Conference".

Wednesday's Sessions.

Wednesday morning was marked by a joint session of all the subsidiary societies meeting at that time in Baltimore. The report of the Board of Managers of Synagogue and School Extension, whose headquarters are in Cincinnati, was the first order of business and the recital of its work aroused great enthusiasm.

The Board has operated in 1492 rural communities, 49 universities, 100 scattered Jewish groups in small towns, 11 institutions for defectives, 47 institutions for delinquents, 27 military encampments, 29 summer resorts, in connection with 8 Jewish (state) religious teachers' associations. Its agents have traveled 166,043 miles in pursuance of their work; 326,200 pieces of mail, including express packages, were sent out by this office last year.

The floor was given to Dr. J. Leonard Levy of Pittsburgh, whose ringing utterances swept the audience off their feet. He spoke on "The Expansion of the Union". His recital of the progress of Judaism in America was listened to with great interest. His announcement of a program of expansion—and missionary activity among Jews—was received with unbounded enthusiasm.

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means, under the chairmanship of Mr. Adolph S. Ochs, was then presented, setting forth a budget for the ensuing year.

This session was signalized by a subscription from the delegates of $135,000 to further the work of the Union.

Wednesday Afternoon.

The progress of the Hebrew Union College was featured in a report presented to the Union. The Hebrew Union College has a faculty numbering some of the most famous scholars, Dr. Kaufman Kohler is president of this faculty. The College has graduated 171 rabbis, of whom a number occupy some of the most prominent pulpits in the country.

An admirable record of service was received in the report of Hon. Simon Wolf, chairman of the Board of Delegates on Civil Rights. Much of the activity of this Board was expended in dealing with various problems arising in connection with immigration and the present war in Europe. The Board also co-operated in providing relief for Jewish war sufferers.

Reception at Phoenix Club.

The delegates were invited to the homes of prominent Baltimoreans for the early part of the evening. Later a reception and entertainment was given for the delegates of both the Union and the Federation at the Phoenix Club.

Thursday's Sessions.

The most important event of this session, and probably of the whole convention, was the report of the Committee on Superannuated Ministers' Pension Fund. The committee, on consultation with Mr. Wolfe, the New York actuary, had drawn up a comprehensive plan. The prospective recipients of pensions were divided into two classes. One class consists of those rabbis who are to enter the ministry from 1917 and onward. The other is made up of those who are already in the ministry. As to the first class, their pensions will be paid from a sum of money that their congregations will deposit annually equivalent to a definite percentage of their salary. The second group will have a similar arrangement supplemented by the interest on a fund of $1,000,000, which it is proposed to raise for this purpose.

In commemoration of his seventieth birthday, Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, has given $100,000 to the Superannuated Ministers' Fund.

All rabbis of the Reform as well as of the Orthodox wing of Jewry are to participate in these pensions.

Thursday Afternoon.

SUBSIDIZING CHEDORIM.

The official Rabbis of a number of large Jewish communities in Russia applied to the Central Committee of Jewish War Relief for support of the seventy Chedorim which they had recently opened in forty-six cities for the especial benefit of the children of the refugees.

Personal efforts in this direction were made by Rabbi Grodzinsky (Vilna), Shapira (Kovno), L. Rabinowitz (Minsk), Aaronson (Kieff), P. Gellman (Ekatorinoslav), Kosofsky (Mariampol), who showed that the Chedorim are in a highly satisfactory condition, both as to hygiene and pedagogy, and that their expense is very moderate, averaging a monthly outlay of from thirty to fifty roubles for its cheder.

The Central Committee considered the matter in the presence of the invited Rabbis and decided that these Chedorim should be supported to the same extent as others, opened for refugee children. The meeting appointed a special committee to take action in this direction, and decide just in what manner and to what extent this assistance should be rendered.

The monthly budget of the Chedorim is approximately 10,000 roubles.

The 65th Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 1, I. O. B. B., was held in the city of Buffalo, Feb. 4 and 5, 1917, at the Hotel Statler, upon the invitation of Montefiore Lodge, No. 70.

The activities of the Convention began Saturday night, Feb. 3, by an informal reception to the visiting delegates and guests. The members of Montefiore Lodge proved themselves most gracious and hospitable hosts. No effort was spared to look after the comfort and convenience of the delegates. The evening's program consisted of an entertainment and dance in the Ball Room of the Hotel Statler The members of all the societies identified with Temple Beth Zion and Temple Beth-El, as well as the members of the Jewish Young Men's Association were invited to attend. The families of the members of Montefiore Lodge turned out in goodly numbers to welcome the guests, and a most delightful evening was spent.

The delegates and their families felt that they were received with true hospitality, so characteristic of B'nai B'rith gatherings. The chairmen of the various committees were:

Banquet, Michael Cohn.
Entertainment, Samuel Brown.
Finance, Leopold Block.
Program, Max L. Fineberg.

The officers of Montefiore Lodge are:
President, Sundel J. Holender.
Vice-President, Michael Cohn.
Secretary, Isaac M. Hellwitz.
Treasurer, Samuel Riseman.
Trustees: Joseph B. Zacheim, Hyman N. Brozeman, Leopold Block.
District Deputy, Samuel Cristall.

The session was opened at 10 a.m. with prayer by Rev. B. Cohn, of Buffalo; the representatives being welcomed on behalf of the city by the Hon. L. Furdhman, the mayor of Buffalo. The president of the District, the Hon. A. K. Cohen, responded very happily, on behalf of the delegates.

After reading the report of the Committee on Credentials and the initiation of the past presidents, the president read his annual message, which was listened to most attentively by the delegates present. The president laid special emphasis in his message upon the Social Service Department, and recommended that this committee become one of the standing committees of the District. The president showed that much social service work was being done during the year, but that it was done by volunteer brothers under the leadership of Bro. Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein, whom he had appointed temporarily as chairman of the Social Service Committee.

The president also pointed out with much satisfaction the splendid work which was being done during the year by Past President Herman Asher, Bro. Meyer L. Victorius, and Bro. William H. Silk, and other devoted and faithful members who have made the headquarters in New York City a center of much B'nai B'rith activity. The president also paid much tribute to Bro. Charles Hartman, member of the Executive Committee, who was of the greatest assistance to him during the year, and who was at all times ready and willing to serve the cause of the District and the Order. The president also showed that the District, during the year, had made much progress, and adding that there was great activity in B'nai B'rith matters all through the Order. The president also called attention to the esteem in which American Jewry holds the Order B'nai B'rith generally, as shown by the appeal made to the head of the Order to adjust matters between the two leading committees on the question of the Jewish Congress. The president expressed the hope that peace will soon be restored, and that the people of Israel, together with the other peoples of the world would soon enjoy peace and prosperity, in the interest of humanity and civilization.

Judge Cohen discussed in his message various problems appertaining to Jewry, such as the Immigration Bill and other matters of Jewish interest. The message, which was couched in the most classic language and which breathed all through, the fine spirit of Judaism and Americanism was vociferously applauded.

The president also called attention to Horeb Lodge, the banner lodge of the District, which now numbers 700 members, also to the new lodge of the District, Israel Lodge, No. 796, of Portland, Me., which was organized last July by the District Secretary, Bro. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, and which is now one of the most active lodges in the District.

Bro. Myron Sulzberger, president of the Board of Governors of the Home, made a very interesting report, which showed that the Home and the members therein were in a most satisfactory condition, the number of members of the Home being 55, all enjoying good health, with the exception of a very few who are well looked after in the hospital of the Home.

Brother Sulzberger expressed his special thanks to the governors of the Home, for their great interest in the welfare of the aged members of the Home.

At the afternoon session, the following brothers were elected as officers for the ensuing year:

President, Joseph L. Rosenzweig, Jordan, No. 15.

Treasurer, Sol. Sulzberger, Mt. Sinai, No. 2.

Members of General Committee: Henry Lasker, Archibald Hillman, Dr. Joseph Silverman, Dr. H. S. Goldstein, Julius Illch, Myer L. Victorius, Wm. H. Silk, Samuel Campner, and Myron Sulzberger as President of Board of Governors.

Brothers William Asher, Senator Henry W. Pollock, Dr. J. L. Blumenthal, Mo Minzesheimer, Abe Anhalt, A. M. Friedman and Jacob Caplan.

The secretary, Bro. Bernard M. Kaplan, also acting as secretary to the Board of Governors.

Sunday evening the delegates and members of Montefiore Lodge were treated to a sumptuous Kosher banquet, which was a most brilliant affair. Much favorable comment was expressed on the thoughtfulness and graciousness of the brothers of Montefiore Lodge, who arranged the Kosher banquet, at which both the orthodox and the members of the liberal wing of Judaism could sit down together and enjoy a B'nai B'rith feast in true B'nai B'rith spirit and mutual respect and mutual tolerance. It has been well remarked that the spirit of Sir Moses Montefiore pervaded the activities of the evening, a spirit which was dignified, Jewish and truly noble. The program of the banquet was as follows:

Grace, Dr. H. S. Goldstein.

Rabbi Louis J. Kopald, Toastmaster.

Hon. Abraham K. Cohen, Outgoing President, District Grand Lodge No. 1.

Joseph Rosenzweig, President Elect, District Grand Lodge No. 1.

Rev. Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Director Social Service Department.

Charles Hartman, Past President, District Grand Lodge No. 1. Member Executive Committee Constitution Grand Lodge.

Rabbi Max Drob.

Rabbi Nachman H. Ebin.

Sundel J. Holender, President Montefiore Lodge, No. 70.

Grace, Rev. Bernard Cohen.

The speeches were of a very happy nature and most appropriate to the occasion. The speech of President-elect Bro. Joseph Rosenzweig, of New York City, elicited the highest encomium from all present, for it reflected the fine sympathetic nature, earnestness and true Jewishness of the man who is to preside over the destinies of District Grand Lodge No. 1 through the coming year.

The session was continued Monday, Feb. 5, Bro. Dr. S. Levinson, of Flatbush, delivering the invocation, and was devoted to the hearing of the reports of the special committees and the adoption of amendments to the By-Laws of the District, Bro. Samuel Fleischman, the honored counsel of the District being the framer of the amendments. Action was also taken on the seventy-fifth anniversary of the District, to be celebrated in New York City in the year 1918 at the same time as the convention.

A distinguished visitor to the Grand Lodge session was Bro. Rudolph I. Coffee, Director of the Social Service Department. The brothers listened with the utmost interest to his inspiring message on Social Service work.

The convention closed Monday night with a grand ball in honor of the visiting delegates, held in the banquet hall of the Hotel Statler.

Bro. Dr. Ettelson, of Hartford, closed the convention with the benediction.

The Position of Jews in the New Poland

By Prof. D. Simonsen

We publish herewith an important article on the Jewish question in Poland, by Prof. Simonsen, former Chief Rabbi of Denmark, which article appeared in the leading Danish newspaper, "Berlingshe Pidende".

The Polish question has now become a burning one. I wish to seize the opportunity of giving a purely objective statement, insofar as the position of the Jews is affected by the rearrangement of the political situation of Poland, on the one hand by the manifesto of the Grand Duke Nicholas on the Autonomy of Poland, and on the other, by the proclamation of the Central Powers on the restoration of the Kingdom of Poland. Only in passing shall I touch upon the disquiet which has arisen owing to the proclamation of Austria of the independence of Galicia, the Ruthenian party, which fears oppression by the Polish majority in Austria, as well as outside their country, having declared they will not submit to the proposed separate constitution for Galicia. Here, I shall only cover that part of Poland where recent events and proclamations have made the national problem an immediate one.

It is well known that the relations between Poles and Jews in Russian Poland have been highly intensified during the last years. About four years ago the Jewish population of Warsaw refused to vote for the Polish candidate for the Duma, on the ground that he was an adversary of equal rights for Jews, and instead sent a Polish socialist to the Duma, as a representative for the City of Warsaw. The leading Polish party, the National Democrats, proclaimed under the journalistic leadership of Mr. Dmowski of the Russian party, a general boycott against the Jews. A well organized fight against Jewish commerce and industry was introduced—a fight was carried on in a manner which was unanimously condemned by all progressive circles.

In many European circles it was supposed that it was the Russian government which supported the reactionary and anti-semitic policy of the Poles in order to weaken both parties. I shall not mention here the sufferings of the small Jewish communities, during these struggles. But upon the behavior of the Poles toward the Jewish population, the recent events in the Kingdom of Poland throw light of great importance.

In the entire Polish press, reports are found of the stormy sitting of the Town Council during the first part of November, only a few days before the historic proclamations. This sitting, too, is justly called historic by leading circles in Poland. The leading men of the Polish and Jewish population expressed clearly and plainly the claims and wishes of the two parties. But it is acknowledged by all broadminded circles that the historic sitting has not reflected honor upon the Poles.

Of very great interest were the speeches of the Jewish spokesman. All friends of Poland will read them with the greatest sorrow, for they contained strong accusations against the Polish rule. All the Jewish representatives arose and declared that the restoration of a free independent Poland forms the political aim most eagerly desired by the Jewish population. Already at the elections for the Town Council of Warsaw, the Jews had substantiated their patriotic assertion; they voluntarily relinquished their claim to the full number of representatives in the Council. The Jews constitute about 40 per cent of the population of Warsaw. According to this they would have been able to obtain about thirty-six of the ninety seats. But the Jews wished to emphasize that they—at the moment when the first step towards an independent Poland were to be taken—acknowledged the leading position of the Polish nation, and, therefore, contented themselves with nineteen representatives in the Council. Though a few radical elements protested sharply against this dangerous self-abnegation and even formed a radical Jewish faction, which obtained four of the nineteen seats. The Jewish population, on the whole, approved of this disinterested behavior. This patriotic resolution was agreed upon, not only by the leading Jewish "Assimilationist" party (whose leader is S. Nathanson, a man of high standing) and the "Neo-Assimilationists", designated also as the "Impartials" (under the leadership of the Danish Consul, B. Eiger, and the devoted Polish patriot, the neurologist, Dr. Goldflamm) and by the severely orthodox Jews, but also by the leading National Jewish party, the Zionists, under the leadership of Mr. Farbstein. This step generally was considered an extreme attempt to attain a mutual understanding, and the Jewish population indulged in the hope that the hand thus stretched out would also be accepted by the Poles. How have the Poles replied to this step and responded to Jewish aims?

The severe accusations of the Jewish representatives against the Polish police (militia) gave us the information needed. Ill-treatment of Jews, innumerable baseless arrests of Jews, even corporal punishment of Jewish wives and children are of every-day occurrence. The magistracy excludes the Jews almost entirely in the distribution of municipal employment. Among eleven thousand workers employed by the municipal body, hardly three hundred are Jews. In the whole municipal apparatus embracing many hundreds of functionaries, hardly two or three Jews are to be found. In short, the Jews are ignored systematically in every respect. It has gone so far that the magistracy itself is demonstrating its hatred towards the Jews in the most incredible manner. The Jewish press is excluded in the distribution to the press of official communications from the Magistracy. Even the free exercise of religion, never assailed by the Russian government, seems not to be secured to Jews in the New Poland. The Town Militia prohibited the Jews to erect in the yards the bowers ordained by the religious law ("Succoth"), demanding that applications be filed with the magistracy, with an advance payment of two rubles for the application stamp. Thus all the Jews to whom the amount of two rubles is equal to a week's income, had to pay down this enormous stamp tax. A great number of these religious bowers were demolished by the police by order of the magistracy. The Polish militia made its way into private dwellings where these bowers were put up on balconies, drove out the families sitting around the tables, demolished the bowers and inflicted punishment upon the lodgers. When the rabbis protested against this proceeding, the magistracy declared that it had been done by order of the German president of police. The latter, however, declared that he knew nothing of this encroachment against religious rights. Only by the intervention of the German authorities was the prohibition repealed.

A stern accusation was also made by the leader of the Zionist party, Mr. Farbstein, who said: "The Jewish community of Warsaw received during a long period considerable amounts for the relief of the poor, especially from Russia and America. When these remittances had ceased, the community sent in an application to the magistracy and requested it to grant 30,000 rubles a month to support the Jewish People's Kitchens. The magistracy refused the application. Was this due to scarcity of means? At the same sitting, the magistracy granted one-half million rubles to other kitchens. Now we must refuse to give thousands of Jewish families their single warm dish. But that does not concern the magistrate They are only Jews. of course"!

Especially stormy were the debates on the occasion of a resolution of the Town Council of Warsaw against the Jews, during which it was revealed that the Jewish and Christian merchants were separated from each other in the market hall, and the rear places alotted to the Jews, while the Poles were given the front rows. This resolution is an example of the return to a medieval state of things—the Jews artificially separated from Christian society, behind the walls of the ghetto. Also, under the pretext of protecting the Sunday rest, the Poles have continued the traditions of boycotting, compelling the Jews whose religion forbids them to trade on Saturdays, to close their shops two days in the week, which they never were compelled to do by the Russian government.

The debate on the Jewish question in the Town Council of Warsaw, did not consequently hold out bright prospects. The same Jewish representatives, who three months before had relinquished their claim to half the number of seats they were entitled to, now refused to vote for the budget. This is an earnest protest, which must attract attention far beyond the frontiers of the Kingdom of Poland.

It is difficult to comprehend that Poland, which during so long a period complained to Europe of being severely oppresed, now plays the part of the oppressor of several millions of a foreign nationality, which has lived in the Polish lands durings hundreds of years.

The war must come to an end some time. But if the war is to be followed by a lasting peace, the rights of the small nationalities in the different countries must be acknowledged and—so far as it is in human power—secured.

NEWS FROM RUSSIA.

Torahs Used for Drum Material.

The Moscow Press relates the following:

In the suburb of Moldavaska, a Jewish tailor came to hear of a certain Alexeieff, who was offering for sale twelve "Sifreh Torahs". The tailor visited Alexeieff and the latter showed him the Torahs, insisting on a very high price for them. The tailor informed Rabbi Abelson of the fact, who personally went to investigate this peculiar matter for himself. Alexeieff explained to the Rabbi that these Torahs had been brought to him by a man who came from Russian occupied territory in Turkey, and he, Alexeieff, had decided to dispose of them by selling the parchment as drum material. Seventeen pieces had already been cut out for this purpose. The police were informed of this sacrilegious proceeding, when they confiscated the Torahs and handed them over to Rabbi Abelson.

Experts who saw the Torahs declare that they are most unusual specimens and are at least a few hundred years old.

Russo-Jews and Food Supply.

One of the government food controllers, M. Gerbel, has made a statement on the anti-Semitic allegations that the responsibility for the food crisis was to be traced largely to the dishonesty of the Jewish firms. In his opinion nothing but praise could be bestowed on the large Jewish firms as regards their honest and beneficial action in connection with the food supply for the Army. No doubt, among the small Jewish traders, there were some who took advantage of the crisis for their own benefit, but the evil was not so great as to create a necessity for special legislation or measures.

The Introduction of An Act About the Karaimes.

The Secretary of the Interior introduced an act to the Duma which, if accepted, will free all the "Hakhamim,' "Hazanim", and "Shamosim" of the Karaim faith from conscription.

Accused of Being Zionists.

In Evpatoria, fifteen Jews were accused and put on trial on the ground that they belonged to the Zionist movement. They were all freed.

To Assist Reservists.

On the 17th of November the Committee to Assist Reservists' Families of Petrograd and vicinity had a meeting.

The chairman, B. A. Komaika, pointed to the scarcity of funds, which seriously hampers the work of the committee.

The average requirement of the committee is about 700 roubles a month, which is distributed in sums of 5 roubles and 40 kopecks. It was decided to raise funds through the distribution of collectionists.

Expulsion of Jewish Students.

At the order of the administration, all Jewish students of the veterinary college in Novo Cherkask were expelled. In Novo Cherkask Jewish students are counted by the score.

A group of these students applied to the district superintendent for a recall of the order, but were informed that such a recall would be in direct opposition to the fundamental laws of the country.

Petrograd Kehillah to Celebrate 50th Anniversary.

1919 will mark the half-century existence of the Petrograd Kehillah. At the last meeting of the Kehillah it was decided to issue a "Sammel Buch," which should embody all the historical material affecting the Kehillah's 50 years of activity in Petrograd. To have this carried out the following committee was appointed: Advocate Schlossberg, S. Pollack, Rabbiner Dr. Eisenstadt, I. Marcon, I. Ginsburg and G. Berenstein.

"Schochtim" Freed from Service.

At Vinitza, in the province of Podolien and Teraspoul, in the province of Chersom, the "Shochtim" have been recognized as clerical dignitaries and have been freed from active service.

Russo-Jewish Students.

The Cabinet has considered the order of the police of Novotcherkask, prohibiting the Jewish students of the Warsaw Veterinary Institute, which was transferred to the first-named town on the evacuation of the Polish capital, to remain in the city. The Cabinet resolved to allow the students already enrolled to remain, but to make it known that the right of domicile would not be granted to Jewish students applying for admission in the future.

A CODE FOR GOOD MEMBERSHIP.

(From "The Fraternal Aid Union.")

A good member observes the following:

1. He attends meetings whenever he can without great inconvenience. In fact he makes a special effort to be present at every meeting, and when he cannot be present he sends his officers notice to that effect.

2. The good member is always with the majority. He may fight as long as the fight is on; when it is settled, he joins the ruling faction and adjusts himself to conditions, even though they may be more or less distasteful to him.

3. A good member is in every sense a fraternalist. He believes in and practices the principles of fraternalism. He respects his vows and solemnly promises that they are to be observed in the spirit as well as to the letter.

4. A good member is never a knocker. He may not fully agree with all the policies of his organization, but outside of the lodge chamber he has something good to say of it. But he is not merely negatively good; he boosts. He puts his shoulder to every piece of constructive work that is proposed and does not only his share, but a little more, if necessary.

5. A good member never speaks of the society as "it", or the management as "they". He recognizes the fact that he has just as big an interest in his fraternity as anybody else has, and that his responsibility is just as great and that his duty is just as solemn as is that of the highest officer in the society.

6. A good member is willing to give a fair share of his time and effort to the promotion of the good of the society, because he recognizes that when he advances the interests of the organization he also advances his own interests.

7. A good member never permits his dues to lapse. Neither does he expect the collector to make two or three trips for each monthly payment. He understands that the collector's time is valuable and that the small compensation paid by the lodge does not provide a fund for the rehabilitation of footwear worn out in trying to collect dues.

There are doubtless many other things that a good member would do, or does not do, but it is fair to say that the man or woman who measures up to the specifications herein will seldom have occasion to receive reprimand from the home office.

THE DROPSIE COLLEGE FOR HEBREW AND COGNATE LEARNING, PHILADELPHIA

A regular quarterly meeting of the Board of Governors was held in the Administration Office of the College. Doctor Cyrus Adler, president, was in the Chair; the other members of the Board present were William B. Hackenburg, Honorable Mayer Sulzberger, Louis Marshall, Louis Gerstley, Oscar B. Teller, Edwin Wolf, Simon Miller, Horace Stern and Ephraim Lederer.

The report of Dr. B. Halper, Custodian of Manuscripts, gave a survey of the Genizah manuscripts presented by Judge Sulzberger. The collection consists of forty-nine fragments which cover all branches of Jewish literature.

The quarterly report of the Library showed that during the past quarter the Library was increased by 433 volumes, 412 by purchase. Additions to the Library were received from Hon. Jacob H. Schiff, Hon. Oscar S. Straus, Roger Straus, Dr. Cyrus Adler, Dr. H. G. Enelow and Eugene Klein.

The gifts of Messrs. Oscar and Roger Straus consisted of very valuable facsimiles of the Zacuto Almanach and astronomical treatises employed by Columbus in preparation for his voyage of discovery.

The Library now totals 16,861 volumes.

Founder's Day will be celebrated on Thursday evening, March 8, 1917.

The winter term began on January 8 and will extend to March 30, 1917.

A FEW BITS OF PHILOSOPHY.

When you are asked to give to the poor—give freely and thank God for the privilege.

Don't keep all your apples 'till your teeth are gone.

A pessimist is a man who of two evils chooses both.

When I suffer with rheumatism, I am always glad I was not born a centipede.

You will always find peace, happiness and contentment in the dictionary.

A man is only a failure when he admits it himself.

Why should I hate him—he hates himself.

THE KEHILLAH, XXX

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

The first pamphlet, which unnecessarily appeared under the pseudonym, was occasioned by the bold advocacy of reform in the Juedische Zeitschrift fuer Wissenschaft und Leben", which his close friends and fellow student, Abraham Geiger, had begun one year previously. It is a remarkable fact, one of the whims of history, that these two men should have begun as friends, and afterwards, when officiating in the same city, should have avoided all personal contact. Geiger, two years younger than Hirsch, and a native of Frankfort-on-the-Main, was one of a circle of young men who prepared themselves for the Jewish ministry at the University of Bonn. They kept up friendly relations, when Hirsch had entered the ministry, but after 1836 were antagonists for the balance of their lives. It is difficult today to see in Hirsch's pamphlet anything which justifies the enthusiasm with which it was received, unless it is the fact that for the first time a man of modern culture defends orthodoxy in a living language. The only point, which I consider a strong argument, is the statement that a religious custom, by its tradition, ceases to be obectionable. This argument was brought forward to refute the charges against old-fashioned customs in Jewish life, such as the rending of garments in the case of a death in the family. Of far greater importance is his Chaurew. It was planned as a complete apology for orthodox Judaism. The book announced itself as a second part, which was to present the apology for Jewish law. The first part, which was to follow under the title of Moriah, was to contain the presentation of Jewish belief. It never appeared. Maybe because the author was too busy with other literary tasks, and it may be also that it would be too delicate to present the orthodox Jewish dogma, without offending the naive believers and giving the liberals an opportunity to point out inconsistencies. A small, but philosophically interesting, point is the adoption of the transliteration of Hebrew words in the German instead of the Portuguese way, as was customary when writing in a European language. I see in it again the law of contrast. The Hamburg Reform Temple, opened in 1818, had adopted the Portuguese pronunciation in the public services. Nobody could say that this was a reform, because it was the practice which the first congregation of Hamburg, composed of refugees from the Inquisition, had followed as a matter of course. It was also followed by the strictly orthodox Jews of the Orient, but to Hirsch it was a reform. The stilted method of expressing his ideas is shown right in the motto of the work, which, taken from Jeremiah 30, 17, ought to be translated, "Although they call Thee, O Zion, an outcast, whom no man seeketh". Hirsch translates, "Wenn auch Verstossene man dich nennet, Denkmal bleibst—Forscher fehlt ihm nur." He read, whether through oversight or intentionally, "Ziyun" instead of Zion. The motto shows what the author wishes to do. Old fashioned Judaism is the rock of ages unaltered, and all objections to it are due to unfair interpretation. The same stilted way of expressing his thoughts Hirsch shows in the first paragraph of his book when he says, "Des Wissens Bluethe sey das Leben. Doch dass dem Wissen das Leben entbluehe, genuegt das Wissen nicht". He evidently wishes to say what the rabbis express in the brief words (Abot. 1, 17): "Not the study, but the practice of religion is the highest aim." His whole theology might be condensed into the statement which he makes in the preface, that the fundamental principle of Judaism is obedience without any questions, and his whole book in which he tries to justify the Jewish religion, is a [illegible] of this fundamental principle. These justifications, which he gives for Jewish practices, are often very far fetched. Thus the custom to cover the head during prayer is to symbolize our belief, that between the heaven above and between the most divine in man which is represented by his head, is an insurmountable barrier. Similarly forced is his interpretation of the law of Zizith. This law is found in the Pentateuch [illegible] 15) following the report of a man who gathered wood on Sabbath. Hirsch, [illegible] in this respect Talmudic precedents [illegible] in this arrangement an ob- [illegible]. The sinner committed his sin on [illegible] when the Jew does not wear [illegible] intended to remind him of [illegible]. He farther committed his sin in the open air, where he could not be reminded of God's laws by the Mezuzah, which serves as such reminder in the home. This necessitated the introduction of another reminder—Hirsch calls it, just as in the motto "Denkmal"—which should be present all the time on Sabbath as well as on week days, in the open air as well as in the home. In his enthusiasm for traditional practices, he occasionally overlooks the fact that these practices are different in different countries. He records, for instance, the practice that the mourner, when reciting the Kaddish, wears the Talith, a custom, which as he could learn as Landrabbiner of Moravia, was unknown to the most observant members of his flock. Another inconsistency is that in his desire to oppose all reforms, he pleads for the retention of the Piyutim, medieval liturgical hymns, which burdened the services, and, being unintelligible to the vast majority of the congregation, led to that improper behavior in the synagogue, which was especially objectionable. In this case some of the most orthodox authorities of Middle Ages, indorsed the views of the reformers. So the stand taken by Hirsch shows that the orthodoxy of his age was different from the orthodoxy of the fourteenth century, and the rock of ages was not as unaltered and unalterable as his book intended to prove.

Whatever cool observers of modern times may say against Hirsch's conception of Judaism, in 1838 it was a great achievement. Here was a man, with modern culture, who inspired the Jew of the old type with the belief that Judaism can remain what it was, and is compatible with life and thought of cultured people of the nineteenth century. This was just what the leaders of communal life in Moravia desired. Their wishes coincided with those of the government, which also wanted the Jews to become civilized. Vienna had, in 1826, opened a new synagogue, with German sermon and with some occasional German prayer, as that for the welfare of the Emperor and the government. Prague had in 1837 opened a "Temple fuer geregelten Gottesdienst" on the Emperor's birthday, and Nikolsburg, while not ready to introduce such departures from sacred traditions, also felt that concessions had to be made. The election of the Landrabbiner was a complicated affair. The Province of Moravia was divided into six districts (Kreis). The congregations of each district voted for a rabbi as elector, and these six rabbis had to submit to the government three names in the order of their merit, and of these the government would select the Landrabbiner. The whole system was antiquated, and an empty formality, because practically the election of the congregation of Nikolsburg decided who the Landrabbiner was to be. On June 30, the new Landrabbiner preached his inaugural sermon, in the presence of the representatives of the government, who had previously sworn him in, the address of welcome was delivered by I. N. Mannheimer, preacher of Vienna, and the famous Cantor Sulzer, with his choir, officiated. It was a gala day, and the great majority of the congregation looked upon the man, who could deliver an address in perfect German, as a wonder, although the most of them did not understand it, and felt awkward to hear the rabbi pronounce Hebrew words in his German style which sounded affected, Goyish. More serious was the objection on the part of the strict orthodox of old times, including the rabbis. Incidents of this kind are rarely recorded, and oral tradition is not always reliable. One story that I heard told was that Hirsch aroused objection by preaching on Yom Kippur Eve, after the recital of Kol Nidre. The former practice had been to begin the services with a sermon. Hirsch's reason for departure from tradition was, that according to the law this formula ought to be recited before nightfall. Tradition, however, is stronger than the written law. The old members of the congregation who remembered Rabbi Mordcai Benet, and perhaps even his predecessor, saw in a departure from the practice of these men, an unpardonable innovation. Reb Sanwel Schweinburg, in spite of his trefah name which points to an Austrian town, a representative of the strictest orthodoxy, felt that the fundamental principles of Judaism had been given up. He expressed his provocation by the indignant remark, "We know that we are not good Jews all the year around, but at least once a year, on Yom Kippur, we want to be Jews." I did not know Reb Sanwel any more, but I did know his son, Moysha, as an old man. Reb Moysha would stand on his feet the whole day of Yom Kippur, and during the Shemone Esreh he bent so that his body formed a right angle. I can, therefore, easily imagine what his father's religious practices must have been. The attitude of the rabbis of the old type I also know only from indirect tradition. When I came to Nikolsburg, in 1870, I boarded with a teacher of the Jewish school, Maier Froeschels, a good pious old soul. Froeschels was a disciple of Solomon Quetsch, afterward Hirsch's successor as rabbi of Nikolsburg, of whom I shall speak later. Quetsch had no use for the "Teitscher Chosid", as he called Hirsch. The cathedral synagogue of Nikolsburg, the Altschul, stands on an elevation, to which some steps are leading. Hirsch, in accordance with the Mosaic law (Ex. 20, 26), which, however, is not applied to the synagogue, avoided these steps, going to the synagogue on the slope, in spite of its terrible cobblestone pavement. Such a practice was to an old fashioned rabbi, offensive, for just as a law should not be broken, a law should not be intended. My father, who did not know Hirsch personally, told me that his teacher, Rabbi Loeb Berlin of Pohrlitz, who was then nearly eighty years of age, was greatly offended when he saw that the Landrabbiner received people who took off their hats, when they entered his library. My teacher, Isaac Hirsch Weiss (1815-1905), was present when Hirsch received the delegations of rabbis and congregational trustees. Among those delegates was also Rabbi Baer Oppenheim (1790-1859) of Eybenschuetz, the father-in-law of Weiss, a descendant of a long line of rabbinical scholars going back to David Oppenheim, who from 1690 to 1705 was Landrabbiner of Moravia. According to the custom, prevailing in olden times, the rabbis began to discuss Talmudic topics. This custom is mentioned in the Talmud (Horavot, 13, b., Nazir, 49, b.) already in the second century. It was then already customary to "show off" one's own scholarship and to trick the rival by quoting an out of the way rabbinic law. One rabbi quoted some difficult passage, found in a remote corner of the Talmud, and another one offered a solution by quoting an opinion of Sabbatai Cohen in his notes on the civil code, Hoshen Mishpat. Hirsch remained silent. Finally, determined to draw him into the discussion, Rabbi Marcus Treischet, of my native town, quoted a difficult passage in the Tosafot (Talmudic Glosses of the 12th century) on the law of the mixture of meat and milk about greasing a pan used for frying meat with butter (Tiggun). On these questions, which concern every household, and which any rabbi in the smallest town must know how to answer immediately, the Landrabbiner surely would have something to say, but the only answer which Hirsch gave was, "What do you understand by 'Tiggun'?" Rabbi Trieschet with that inimitable gesture of contempt, typical of the Beth Hamidrash, turned around and laughed. Hirsch also gave directly offense to the rabbis, by addressing to them a circular, that they should report to him on the conditions of Shehitah and Mikwah in their congregations. This was a direct insult. Hirsch mistook conditions in Moravia for those in Emden and Oldenburg, where the spiritual head of the congregation would be a teacher of no rabbinic learning. It certainly is a fact that in spite of the admiration by the cultured element and of the government's support, in spite of the fact that he was elected to the diet of Moravia, after the revolution in 1848, Hirsch felt very uncomfortable. He seized the first opportunity offered to leave his place when a call was extended to him by the recently created orthodox congregation of Frankfurt in 1851. Here again the law of contrast is visible. Frankfurt was one of the earliest homes of reform, and just for the same reason orthodoxy became consolidated. It had the good fortune to find a backer in the house of Rorthschild, especially in Baron Anselm, the oldest of the five brothers (1773-1855), and in his nephew, Wilhelm (1829-1901). An interesting feature in this connection is the fact that these negotiations were opened by Gerson Josaphat, then teacher in Talmud at Frankfurt, subsequently Klausrabbi in Halberstadt. This Rabbi Josaphat, a representative of the blackest orthodoxy, is an interesting type. He was the son of a rabbi of Kassel, and a brother of Israel Baer Josaphat (1816-1899), better known as Baron Paul Julius Reuter, the founder of the famous Reuter agency, the first great international news bureau. Needless to say, Baron Reuter became a member of the Episcopal church, and his young grandson, who became heir to the firm, after his father's suicide, perhaps does not even know of his connection with the latest phase of modern orthodoxy. Gerson Josaphat addressed Hirsch as "Mein lieber Reb Schamschon", which undoubtedly is affected. Even in the orthodox circles of Frankfurt, Baron Anselm Rothschild was no more Reb Anschel. Reb Gershon suggests to Reb Schamschon that he take the position as rabbi of the new orthodox congregation of Frankfurt and one of the points in favor of the change is, that Reb Schamschon, with all his orthodoxy, will feel more at home in the German city of Frankfurt, in spite of its numerous infidels, than in good old orthodox Nikolsburg, where no store was open on Sabbath, even in my time, as late as 1876, and probably much later, and where to carry a cane on Sabbath might have exposed a man to being mobbed. The trustees of the Moravian congregation made earnest efforts to retain the Landrabbiner. They offered to obtain from the government the right to transfer the seat of the Landrabbinate to Bruenn, the capital of the province, since 1848 opened to Jewish residents, but Hirsch declined, and he acted wisely. He needed the German atmosphere, not only in order to feel comfortable, but because only there his "Chaurew" theology could find a fertile soil. There he could fight for orthodoxy against reform, while in Nikolsburg he would have to fight as a reformer against orthodoxy, as it was understood there. In Nikolsburg his activity left no trace behind, but in Frankfurt he became a historic character, the chief exponent of Neo Orthodoxy, a religious principle, which stands for strict observance in ritual, in spite of the acknowledgment of modern culture.

JEWISH WAR SUFFERERS IN RUSSIA.

The Joint Distribution Committee of Funds for Jewish war sufferers, which committee has been officially recognized by the Russian government for distribution of relief moneys for the Jews in Russia, is in receipt of the following telegram through Ambassador Frances, dated January 16, 1917, from the Jewish Committee for the relief of war victims in Petrograd.

"Our Central Committee now extends relief to 238,000 people, forming 51,000 families, of which 38 per cent are either deprived of the fathers, or the family heads. Thirty-seven per cent are children below fourteen years, and 15 per cent aged and sick, making 52 per cent who are unemployables. Thanks to organiation of labor assistance, a third require support. However, more than a half still need serious relief for food, housing, clothing and fuel. Government aids Jewish refugees through our committee, but this aid is very limited. Aiming at gradual reduction, Government allows eight roubles monthly for food, housing and fuel, for 105,000 refugees. Owing to unprecedented dearness, this help is utterly insufficient and has to be completed out of philanthropic resources. For upkeep of children below school age and of school children in day nurseries and schools, the government grants 75,000 roubles monthly; for clothing and footwear, 50,000 roubles; for medical help, 25,000 roubles. Altogether about 100,000 roubles monthly. Sums expended by our committee included one million roubles for occupied Galicia, one and a half millions additional relief for clothing, linens and boots in Russia, 400,000 roubles for fuel, which is very expensive and goes in great quantities, owing to winter time, and 750,000 roubles for small loans. Continued mobilization and the necessity of keeping up soldiers' families, absorbs considerable means of local Jewish communities, so that no large philanthropic contributions for refugees can be expected from Russian Jews. The nearest future budget for food, housing, fuel, schools, labor and assistance to refugees is estimated at 1,800,000 roubles monthly. For relief in occupied Galicia 150,000 roubles and 200,000 roubles for relief of population in war area, where no committees work and no government penetrates. Altogether, 2,150,000 roubles are required monthly, to defray which we may count upon, one million roubles from government and 350,000 roubles from local philanthropic resources, thus 800,000 roubles monthly are wanting. Besides sums specially designated, we have 150,000 roubles in cash in hand and 800,000 with JCA. This money is gradually being used up and a deficit is unavoidable. We therefore urgently pray to send us the money wanting for the next four or at least three months."

Jewish Relief Committee,
Chairman, Baron Alex. Gunzberg.

In Occupied Austrian Territory.

At the suggestion of the Russian Governor General, of occupied territory in Galicia, the local schools are being reopened. The Governor has permitted the use of all prevailing languages barring German and Yiddish.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, January 18, 1917.

It is to be expected that in all communal life the older men must give place to the younger. "One generation goeth and another generation cometh, but the world goes on for ever." The process normally works with such regular rhythm that no special attention need be called to it. When, however, a community loses its leaders in quick succession, its plight is indeed pitiful. The Anglo-Jewish community has been particularly unfortunate of late in this respect. Only the last letter on this page recorded the death of Felix Davis, and today we must tell of the loss of Albert Henry Jessel. The two were linked together in their work, in their sympathies and in the esteem in which they were held by the community. "Jessel and Davis" was a kind of formula in congregational politics which summed up the existing program. The lay head of the community, usually the President of the United Synagogue, was, until his death, the late Lord Rothschild. At present his brother, Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, occupies this place of honor. But the actual work of carrying on the business of the community is left to the two Vice-Presidents of the United Synagogue. Jessel was Senior Vice-President and Davis was his "junior" colleague. And now Death, the Reaper, whose harvest during the last two years has been chock-full, has claimed these two workers, and the Jewish community in England is the poorer for their loss.

Jessel was by no means an old man. He was born in 1864, and went through the training usual for Englishmen of the upper classes. The public school was followed by Oxford, and then Jessel took up law, a profession adorned by his uncle, the late Sir George Jessel, who was Master of the Rolls. It need hardly be said that he became distinguished. His specialty was Chancery work, and he soon became a favorite in the Courts and obtained a large practice. Of his general public life only his political activities need receive notice here. More than once he stood as a candidate for Parliament, but he never succeeded in being elected, though it is stated on excellent authority that had he lived he would almost certainly have been returned to the House of Commons for the Hackney division of London.

In the community he has a long record of honorable service. He was a man of strong Jewish sympathies. Already as an undergraduate at Oxford he helped to establish the Oxford Hebrew Congregation, one of the two unique Jewish Congregations in this country, both run by students. (The sister community is in Cambridge.) Equally significant for Jessel's outlook was that he had his boys taught Hebrew according to the newest method of "Ibrith be' Ibrith," and he sought out for them the best available teacher. That he was interested in Jewish thought and letters need hardly be stated. The larger Jewish problem also interested him, and he was ever ready to discuss its solutions in a most hopeful spirit. The same breadth of outlook he brought to the work of the Anglo-Jewish community, and his wit found scope and admiration at the meetings of the United Synagogue Council. Many people could not see eye to eye with his policy, but that was the fault of the system, not of the man. The man was esteemed within the community and without. At the memorial service, held last Sunday, there were present among others beside the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Eve, who was a personal friend of Jessel, Mr. Justice Bankes and Mr. Justice Warrington.

The loss of men like Jessel and Davis, a calamity at any time, is particularly regrettable in the present circumstances, when the younger men of the community are occupied with national work either abroad or at home. War, in modern times, becomes a highly organized business, and in all belligerent countries there is much to do for the whole population. The "old guard" in all associations must be left to carry on, and it is a distinct loss when the tried leaders drop out. Nevertheless, each generation is bound to produce the men it needs, and Anglo-Jewry will assuredly prove no exception. The war itself shows that many men need only opportunities to give proof of the mettle of which they are made. The last list of those specially "mentioned in dispatches", for example, contains the names of several Jews, including that of Major the Rev. Michael Adler, the Senior Jewish Chaplain to the Forces. In the same way the lists of conferred honors likewise contain Jewish names. Thus the D.S.O. (Distinguished Service Order) has been conferred on Brigadier-General Seligman, Lieut. Col. Harold A. Cohen, Lieut. Col. F. D. Samuel and Captain Dr. Myer Coplans. All this demonstrates that the present generation contains men who, given opportunities, are as capable as their forbears. It shows furthermore, what indeed has become axiomatic to those whose vision is clear, that Jewish emancipation is a sound policy for every country, for by allowing Jews freely to participate in the national life, talents and capacities that are of use to the state are set free for its service.

There are now some half a dozen Jewish Chaplains at the front, while when the war started, only one was in commission. The inwardness of this fact speaks for itself. It is only borne out by casualty lists, no less than by the list of honors and promotions. This is of interest merely as a record of work done. As in the Boer War, English Jews have done their duty to the country to the full. And those behind the front have been no less active. The latest published list of donations to the Y. M. C. A. hut fund contains a subscription of £500 (say 2000 dollars) from the Jewish Community. The Y. M. C. A. has established a chain of huts, centers, shelters, refreshment rooms, reading and recreation rooms, extending from this country right up to the firing line. Wholly excellent reports have come in of this splendid work, and Jewish soldiers have enjoyed the hospitality of the "Huts". Even if the enterprise were denominational, its achievements would deserve support. But it is not: It ministers alike to all soldiers of whatever creed.

The question of the soldier's creed was the topic of conversation some time ago in Anglo-Jewry. One of our younger ministers, the Rev. Vivian Simmons, who is a Chaplain to the forces, in a sermon he delivered in his synagogue the last time he was home on leave, put forward the rather bold view that after the war, the ex-soldiers' attitude to Judaism will be very different from what it was before; that, among other things, he will discard ceremonial, and attach importance to what unites all religious men, be their belief what it may. The sermon contained some interesting statements of facts that had been observed by the preacher in his experiences among the soldiers, but his logic was bad, and therefore his conclusion utterly fallacious. Nevertheless, his statement of the problem was of use. When so much has been shaken by the war, when ethical and moral cords have been loosed, when the economic framework of society everywhere will need overhauling, what of the new outlook on life? Will there be room for religion? And if so, what will its peculiar aspect be? Perhaps the question is unnecessary. Perhaps when the destroying sword is still, men will sink back into their old ruts. Those who care will go on caring, and those who have not either inclination or the training, will sink back into the religious lethargy in which the war found them. It is all a question of education, and it would be an excellent thing if it were possible to fix an educational syllabus for Hebrew, Jewish History and the elements of religion for all Jewish children the world over. The Order might well bear some such scheme in mind, and utilize an opportunity for its realization if one should offer.

A problem arising directly out of the war is about to be tackled by a Committee of the London Lodge. As is generally known, large numbers of Canadians and Australians have come to England, on their way to France, and a goodly number of Jews are among them, especially from Canada. Both officers and men are strangers in this vast metropolis, and the Lodge intends to help organize some machinery for providing them with hospitality. Moreover, some of the officers will undoubtedly be interested in seeing something of communal life and of communal institutions. Arrangements are in progress to give them a welcome in private families and to make their stay in London as instructive and comfortable as possible.

The First Lodge of England is to hold its annual meeting this month, and the election of officers and council will be reported in our next letter. Last year it was decided, in view of the special circumstances, not to hold an annual meeting. The existing officers thus continued to direct the affairs of the Lodge for two successive years. One of the most cheering pieces of work during this period has been the expending of the resources at the disposal of the Lodge, either by way of contribution to special relief funds, as for example the fund for providing food for the Jews interned at Ruhleben, or that or providing Kosher eatables for German and Austrian Jews interned at Douglas, or to the Russian Relief Fund; or else, by way of loans to Belgian refugees in order to enable them to become economically independent. Some of these loans are still outstanding, but the amount is relatively so small (and it may yet be paid back) that the total result can be regarded as essentially satisfactory.

At the last meeting of the London Lodge, Mr. David Mowshovitch, secretary of the Petrograd Jewish Committee, addressed the members on the condition of the Jews in Russia. Though in outline the position is generally well known all over the world, it was yet of interest to hear the details from one so intimately acquainted with them, as is Mr. Mowshovitch. There is no need to repeat the oft-told tale of injustice and oppression. But what is of great significance is the view put forward by Mr. Mowshovitch, that when reforms are carried through in the whole of Russian life, the Jews will profit with the rest of the population; and, furthermore, that the introduction of such reforms is by no means unlikely. Mr. Mowshovitch also told us of the praiseworthy work done in Paris, to inform French public opinion as to the disabilities of Russian Jews. Moreover, Gustave Herve deserves special mention in this connection. In his "Victoire" he demands that justice shall be accorded to the Russian Jew, and recently in setting forth his good wishes for the year 1917, expressly included the hope that the new year may bring betterment to this sorely tried section of humanity.

For many years past Whitechapel has been represented in Parliament by a Jewish member. The late Lord Swaythling, before he went to the Upper House, sat as Liberal Member, as Mr. Samuel Montagu, and he was succeeded by his nephew, Sir Stuart Samuel, who likewise held the seat in the Liberal interest. Sir Stuart is now retiring, and although a Jewish candidate is in the field in the person of Mr. George Cohen, he has not been returned, inasmuch as there was no contest. During the war it is being observed as an almost universal unwritten rule that in case of a parliamentary vacancy, the party that had the seat before shall be allowed to retain it. As Mr. Cohen is a Conservative, the Liberal Party's candidate, who this time is not a Jew, has been returned. But at the next general election after the war, we are promised an interesting contest, for Mr. Cohen will presumably stand; there will likewise, no doubt, be a Liberal candidate, and in addition an independent candidate is to stand in the interests of the Whitechapel and Spitalfields Costermongers' and Street Sellers' Union, whose choice has fallen on Mr. John Raphael.

CITY CO-OPERATES WITH JEWISH ORGANIZATION.

The New York City authorities, recognizing the great value of educating the immigrant and making him self-supporting and independent in the land of his adoption, and inculcating American principles, are deeply interested in the work being done in this direction.

The Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America among its many activities conducts a series of lectures on Sunday evenings in the auditorium of its building at 229 East Broadway.

Lectures are given on government, civics and kindred subjects, and the city departments are co-operating to the extent of assigning members to speak on topics connected with the respective departments.

The fire department has already been represented by a lecture on fire prevention delivered by Mr. Julius Goldberg. The police and health departments have also assigned speakers, and the street cleaning and other departments have signified their intention to join in the work.

The speaker for the police department will be Sergeant Rafsky, who understands and speaks Yiddish, and who has been especially detailed to lecture on the work of the police department and its methods throughout the city.

The lecture given by the health department is especially valuable on the question of the relation of sanitation to health and the lecturer is assisted by a set of stereopticon views.

It is better to use fair means and fail, than foul and conquer.—Salhurst.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN UNIVERSITY.

The professor of Social Psychology at the University of Buenos Ayres, Dr. Anjiasi, expressed his opinion that the Jews are false and hypocritical. He proved this by the fact that the Jews hide their origin whenever they come among others. As an example, he named the Jewish students of that university who call themselves Argentinians. The Jewish students called his attention to the fact that they call themselves Argentinians, not because they wish to hide their origin, but because they were born in Argentina and are citizens of that country. To this the professor replied that not all those who are born in a country belong to the nation of that country. The society of the Jewish students at the Buenos Ayres university called a meeting at which they expressed their indignation at the insults of the professor. At the meeting it was decided to send a note to the minister of education asking him to take the necessary steps that such things should not occur any more

WHO IS WHO?

The many telegrams and letters sent to the president of our Order show convincingly that the malevolent, undignified, unjust attacks on the Order by a certain coterie at the December meeting of the Congress Executive Committee, have been resented outside of our own circles.

Our members were divided in opinion on the desirability of the Congress, but once we joined in the movement, it was obviously our part to sink our differences, to rule out all questions of precedence, to ignore petty considerations of sectional pride, to let no personalities dictate the proceedings now and hereafter when all our energy and thought should go to the momentous business before us. Truly, if precedence were to be emphasized, our Order was entitled to first consideration, and the honor unsought which was conferred on our executive was a tribute to the organization he represents, an organization which for three-quarters of a century has stood forth as the defender of the Jewish people.

With true neutrality and with our eyes solely upon what the cause of the Jewish people abroad called for, we repeatedly let it be known that we are willing to co-operate with any and everybody having aims similar to our own and wholeheartedly devoted to the duty of the hour. With us, it has never been a case of aggrandizement of our own organization. Our achievements in the past insure our standing in the Jewish community. We require no credentials. We are not like our detractors out for power. We are here to serve the Jewish cause—nothing else matters. We brand as pernicious not to ourselves, but to the cause which we have at heart, the attack made at that meeting by a satellite of another organization on the character of our Order.

The spokesman for the minority, in placing his able chief in nomination expressed regrets that the majority of the committee on nominations saw fit to recommend as permanent chairman of the Congress Committee, a man who is the head of an "International Secret Organization".

What are we to think of the judgment of a person who aspires to lead and makes an appeal for votes for his nominee to an assembly of which about ninety per cent belong to fraternal organizations and urges that membership in a fraternal organization should be a bar to the election of the opposition candi- [illegible]

The Order of B'nai B'rith is an International Fraternal Organization. Fraternal organizations are recognized by the laws of States in the Union as useful and beneficial. Each fraternal organization has some signs and pass-words for identification of its members. The Masons are an International Fraternal Organization. Did the fact that one of the Grand Masters of that organization was King of England deprive him of the loyalty of the English people? Was George Washington disqualified from being President of the United States because he was a member of the Masonic fraternity? If yes, then for the same reason the majority of the Presidents of the United States were disqualified and should not have been elected. The Order of B'nai B'rith has less of so-called secrecy than any fraternal organization in existence. Outside of a sign, a pass-word and outside of failing to publish the names of the sick and needy whom the lodges financially assist, everything that the Order does, appears in print. Its ritual, Constitution, By-Laws, rules and regulations, are printed, and have been submitted to European governments, including Russia, for inspection and approval.

The American Jewish Committee is not a fraternal organization, nor an international one. Is it a secret organization? Its meetings are conducted in executive session behind closed doors. The Convention, the highest authority of the B'nai B'rith, meets with open doors; it makes its laws, rules and decisions, and adopts plans for the future in the presence of anybody and everybody who wants to come and hear, including the press.

We aim not to upset rightful authority. Rather it has been one of the principal lessons inculcated by our Order that the Jew forms an integral part of the nation of which he is a part, of the country of which he is a citizen. We teach loyalty and patriotism, we recognize the Jew as a citizen, as in this land so in every land. Where the Jew is denied elementary rights or made the subject of discriminating legislation, we seek by means peaceful and legitimate, and that in the open and above board, to bring about an amelioration of their status. The aspersions on our secret and international character are on a par with the calumnies against the Jewish people spread by our enemies the anti-Semites. Hence the attacks against us of the Order partakes of the nature of the anti-Semitism indulged in by certain Jews; it is just as reprehensible, if not more so, than the other kind. Ours is not the craven attitude of those who always fear to be misunderstood. Our conscience is clear. We say to the world: Give the Jews their right wherever they are denied them; cease persecuting them; grant them freedom of worship and movement, and the greater part of our work shall have been done. We shall still have something to do. We stand for strengthening the Jewish consciousness. We guard the Jew against defamation, and we want the Jew always so to conduct himself as to be above reproach. We are confronted with a division in the ranks of Jewry. We do not mix ourselves up in partisan quarrels. We leave it to the rabbis to settle matters of faith. We leave it to the individual Jew to choose his affiliations on religious lines. But we provide the lodge as the common meeting ground for all Jews. We also discountenance divisions of a social character. We strive to unite the rich and the poor, the immigrant of yesterday and the immigrant of today. And we maintain that our neighbors well know how we have exemplified throughout our entire career that in looking after the Jew we are building up good and loyal citizens. We stand for the ideals of humanity. Our voice is heard whenever a section of humanity is persecuted unjustly. We have been a power for the good in this land and in other lands. And whatever power our executive body yields, it is conferred upon it in true democratic fashion by the constituent lodges and ultimately by the individual members. Ours has been the task to build up and not to destroy, to unite and not to divide, to make peace and not to incite strife. And so we intend to proceed.

JUST WHAT WE LONG FOR.

The President's address to the Senate on January 22 startled, as it did its immediate hearers, the American people and the world at large and has now by common consent, come to be recognized as a document of momentous character, epoch-making alike in its immediate appeal to present world conditions and in its consequences. It was not to be expected that its boldness, mitigated by candor, would pass unchallenged. Mr. Wilson spoke rather to his fellow citizens than for them. He seemed to invite discussion rather than to set forth crystallized public opinion. We, the people, appear to be, and are, in the dark; our chief executive walks and talks in the light of fullest information and deepest convictions. And yet somehow we must agree with his own estimate of his notable speech that he has said "what everybody has been longing for".

Everybody, indeed, here and abroad, is longing for an end to the bloody war. There must be peace, and it cannot come too soon. The whole fabric of European civilization, the whole future of the white race in Europe is at stake. It is an internecine strife among races of kindred stock, holding to the same ideals, sharing the identical culture. The best of their ripe manhood has already been wiped out. Another year of carnage and Europe will pause to consider how it is to be repeopled again. Shall its wastes be suffered to invite invasion from the Far East with its millions of yellow humanity? It is not a matter of color, but it is a matter of culture. For nearly two thousand years the European nations have been at work to temper an innate ferocity with the gentle teachings of the Jewish prophets. It is true, this very war shows that their labors have not been crowned with success. There has been a recrudescence of barbarism on all sides. Right has been trampled under foot. The strong have ridden roughshod over the weak. But the conscience of mankind is not quite deadened. Here on the western continent the flame is not permitted to be extinguished, snuffed out by the storm of passion. The dreams of Isaiah and Micah in the far past bid fair to be realized. For if we ask for the source of our President's inspiration we shall not go far afield in tracing it back to the Book, to the Hebrew Scriptures with their message that the weak must be protected against the strong and that after the last upheaval there must come to be the league of nations for peace and the works of peace.

Peace is possible, says the President. Yes, he boldly maintains, if it is to be stable, it must be a peace without victory. The statesmen of Europe may lose themselves in academic discussions as to whether either side may claim victory at the present. We at a distance have the clearer and more real vision. They may point to notable achievements. The Central Powers may justly boast that they have kept a world of enemies at bay, that the war map shows them nearly everywhere in the ascendant. And the Allies may with equal justice point out how the aims which their enemies set out to accomplish have not been accomplished at all. Be that as it may, the President asserts that no victory ought to be sought; that both sides should rest their arms, each well satisfied with the object lesson offered to the other and meet over the green table to arrange conditions for the future which will make the recurrence of the past struggle well nigh impossible. It will necessarily mean give and take, but the net result will be stability making for "freedom of life, not for equipoises of power".

The President recognizes that the nations must have a voice in determining their own future. He specifies Poland as an instance of the supreme need of rectifying past errors, of making restitution for old offences against the inherent rights of nationalities to autonomous life. But Mr. Wilson is equally sagacious to demand that "henceforth inviolable security of life, of worship, and of industrial and social development should be guaranteed to all peoples who have lived hitherto under the power of Governments devoted to a faith and purpose hostile to their own." We flatter ourselves that the President ostensibly had in mind our co-religionists and peoples of other faiths whose treatment by their masters has been a perpetual cause for indignation among right-minded men, when he gave utterance to those lofty sentiments. It is exactly what we long for. A durable peace in Europe, particularly in the East of Europe, in Russia and Rumania, as well as in the Near East, will be impossible as long as the inalienable rights of the Jewish citizens are withheld. We have therefore reason to believe that the voice of America, of the American government, will, when the time comes, be heard on the side of the Jewish people who long for an opportunity to stand equal before the law that they may be free to worship God according to their own conscience, to maintain their traditions as individuals and as compact masses, to enjoy industrial and social freedom, to help building up the larger nations of which they may form a part. The peace that is to come must be external and internal. The ancient landmarks of territory must be made safe against aggression. But equally safeguarded must be the landmarks of separate cultures and traditions. The world will be richer for the variety of national expressions. In the case of the Jew, our identity is cultural, religious. Let the eyes of the responsible statesmen be opened to the conviction ripened in our President's utterances that it were a crime to down the Jew, and that it will be a blessing both to Jew and Gentile to have them live in amity and unity of purpose though along distinct lines of ancestral tradition. It is just what we long for, no more and no less.

HERMAN GUTSTADT.

Mr. Herman Gutstadt of San Francisco, who for more than thirty years was a much respected member of the community, passed away on Sunday, January 14, 1917, after a brief illness. Mr. Gutstadt was considered an authority on history and political economy. He aided in the framing and passage of the Chinese Exclusion Law in Congress. The deceased was a past president of District Grand Lodge No. 4 of the Order, to which organization he rendered most valuable services.

SWISS PRO CAUSA JUDAICA COMMITTEE.

In a special manifesto the committee has announced its intention to prepare a memorial on the Jewish problem and submit it to all governments, deputies, political leaders and newspapers in civilized countries. The committee will also convene in Switzerland a conference of Jewish organizations in neutral countries to arrange a plan of campaign for rights for Jews.

REFUGEES EXPELLED FROM SIBERIA.

In Blagowestchensk, Siberia, all the refugee Jews who settled there since the Tcherbatov circular went into power, were ordered to leave for their homes. Many of them had already established themselves in business in their new surroundings, while some have no home to which they can go, since their native towns are still in the hands of the enemy

PASSPORTS FOR RUMANIAN JEWISH VOLUNTEERS.

A number of Rumanian Jews in Paris, who volunteered for service in their native country and appealed to the Consul to send them home, were suddenly confronted with the difficulties of the passport regulations for foreign Jews traveling via Russia. The Rumanian Consul decided to describe them in their passports as Christians and thus obviate the difficulty, but the volunteers declined to accept the passports and requested the Consul to find another solution to the question.

Ex-President Taft's Plea for the Jews

Ex-President William Howard Taft in two addresses delivered before the National Geographic Society of Washington, made a remarkable plea in behalf of the Jewish people, speaking on the subject, "The Progressive Tendencies of Eighteen Hundred Years of Jewish History—Will the Present War Help?" He paid a warm tribute to the Jew in history and strongly urged upon this government the assumption of a policy of assisting the Jews in securing the abolition of civil disabilities and other restrictions, at the Peace Conference to be held by the belligerent nations at the close of the present war.

The mere fact that Mr. Taft has come out publicly as a champion of the Jews and in behalf of the movement to secure full equality for the Jews in Russian and Roumania, is a circumstance of very great importance and may be helpful in reducing prejudice, as well as in bringing to success any efforts contemplated to terminate discrimination in those countries. His incorporation of a statement placing the responsibility for Jewish persecution upon Christianity, and his plea for the active co-operation of the government of this country in the movement, are particularly noteworthy and valuable. It is particularly gratifying that in the two audiences that packed the Auditorium to hear Mr. Taft were diplomats, jurists, legislators, and other prominent citizens—a class of men who are active in shaping the policies of this country. We quote from Mr. Taft's address, a few paragraphs:

"I do not need to emphasize the remarkable character of the Jewish people. They are the only people who, for 1800 years, have had no country, have been dispersed to the four corners of the world, and yet have retained their religion, their cohesion, their intellectual capacity, their loyalty to race, and have, wherever there was any pretense of equality of opportunity for them, forged their way ahead into positions of prominence and power in business, in professions, in philosophy, in art, in literature, and in government.

"No other people has ever been subjected to such continuous peresecution in denial of opportunity to make a living, for pursuit of happiness, in humiliating restrictions upon their liberty, in exclusion from education, and, indeed, in actual physical cruelty and massacre."

After a detailed description of the prosecution and wonderings of the Jews for fifteen centuries, he paused and put this question to the audience:

"What are the reasons for this almost endless persecution of the Jew from the fourth century to the nineteenth?"

Following this, Mr. Taft entered into consideration of the Jews' present condition.

With emphasis upon each word in the sentence, he answered: "I greatly regret to say that it must be mainly attributed to the intolerance of Christianity".

"On the other hand, what do we find to justify this persecution? The history of the Jews in all countries in which they have settled has been that they have rallied to the support of the government under which they lived. Their patriarch, Samuel of Nehardea, sixteen centuries ago laid down the rule, 'The law of the government is the law', and in the eighteen centuries in which the Jews have been wandering over the face of the earth, treachery to the government of their adoption and rebellion have not been frequent among them.

"While it has been contended", Mr. Taft said, "that the restrictions against the Jew have been due to popular prejudice, it is nevertheless unrebuttable that wherever popular government has come into the ascendency, those restrictions have ceased.

"Today it may be said broadly, that Jewish disabilities have been taken away practically in all countries of note with the exception of Russia and Roumania. The great problem then for the Jews is to secure civil equality in these countries.

"And it may be said that at present the future seems most optimistic for his relief from these disabilities. If the Jew has ever shown his loyalty to his adopted country, it has been in the present war. From all reports in Russia, which has treated him so cruelly, and where one could hardly expect the Jews to fight for the government at all, their percentage of service is as high as the Russians themselves.

"In the World's Congress, the form and constitutional guarantees of independent governments, and changes in policies will form the subject of discussion, and nothing could be more relevant than the question of what shall be done with the Jews?

"In this World Conference, the United States will undoubtedly have great influence—an influence which I am afraid we do not sufficiently realize the importance of.

"This country has no right to withhold the use of this power when the civil equality of the Jew is at stake.

"Why should we render the Jews this assistance, you ask? Our traditional impulse to promote liberty, religious tolerance, and equality of opportunity everywhere, is the answer. The contents of Secretary of State Hay's note in 1902, protesting against Roumania's violation of the Treaty of Berlin in her treatment of the Jews is a sufficient basis upon which the United States should proceed."

Mr. Taft concluded his lecture in the following words, uttered with great earnestness:

"Let us all rejoice that the oppression of the Jew has ceased in almost all civilized countries—but, at the same time, let us not forget, as the basis of our continued responsibility, that Christianity has been responsible for seventeen centuries of his suffering."

AMERICAN UNION OF RUMANIAN JEWS.

The Executive Board of the American Union of Rumanian Jews held its first session Jan. 21 at the headquarters of the organization, New York City. The president, Dr. P. A. Siegelstein, opened the meeting and gave a brief review of the work done by the organization since Dec. 31, when the convention was held at Philadelphia. Dr. M. Y. Belber, of that city, was then unanimously elected chairman of the Executive Board and the Hon. Charles Fleck, vice-president.

The first and most important subject that the Executive Board had to pass upon was the question of relief. On this it was decided that an appeal shall be issued to the constituent organizations in the United States, Canada and in Cuba, that they in turn shall take up relief work in such manner as they may deem proper in their respective localities, also with instructions that all funds collected be sent through the home office to the Joint Distribution Committee, New York. Such funds have already been sent in through the home office of this organization. These came from Montreal, $900; from Youngstown, Ohio, $50; from the Rumanian American Young Men's Society, $500; from Toronto, Canada, $900.

A committee on propaganda was appointed.

A. H. Hurst, of Glasgow, Scotland, who is here as special commissioner for the purpose of raising a non-sectarian relief fund for war sufferers, was received by the board, and he stated his object in coming to the United States and what he seeks to get from the organization. The matter was referred to a special committee to confer with the British gentleman.

JEWISH ATHLETES TO HOLD CONGRESS AT LODZ.

On October 17 a tournament of athletic and gymnastic organizations took place at Wlaazlawek. Representatives were present from Lodz, Warsau, Plock, Kutno, Ozen, Stochow and Tomaszew. The whole local Jewish population turned out to witness the exceptional gymnastic feats of the contestants. In the evening a business session was held at which it was decided to call a Congress of all Jewish athletic organizations in Poland, with the object of centralizing the efforts and activities of these different organizations. The Congress, it was decided, will be held at Lodz and will have the following program for consideration:

1. The combining of all Athletic and gymnastic organizations in Poland.

2. The establishment of one language as a medium for instruction.

3. To define the attitude of these organizations to the Jewish national movements.

4. Cultural work.

5. The establishment of an organ.

A banquet concluded the proceedings in which the whole town participated.

PUBLICATION SOCIETY HONORS BIBLE EDITORS.

The Jewish Publication Society of America gave a banquet on Monday evening, Jan. 22, 1917, at the Hotel Astor, New York, to the members of the Board of Editors of the new bible translation which has just been completed, and which will be published simultaneously in this country and in England in a few days. The members of the Jewish Classics Committee were also honored guests. Mr. Mayer Sulzberger, of Philadelphia, the chairman of the Publication Society, presided. Among the pleasant surprises of the evening was the presentation to each of the guests of a copy of the new bible containing an engrossed inscription with the name of the recipient and the occasion of its presentation. Specially bound copies were presented to the members of the Board of Bible Editors, these presentations being made by Mr. Jacob H. Schiff.

At the conclusion of the dinner and after the prayer of thanks by Rev. M. Hymanson, the toastmaster in his introductory remarks told of the achievements for which the celebration had been arranged and the work still to be accomplished by the society. He introduced Dr. Kaufman Kohler, who lauded the Jewish classics; Dr. Max Margolis, Editor-in-chief of the Bible Revision, who spoke of the necessity of the new translation of the Bible; Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, who made the happy presentation address; Dr. Wm. Rosenau, who expressed appreciation on behalf of the Central Conference of American Rabbis for the work accomplished by the Publication Society, and Dr. Cyrus Adler, chairman of the Board of Bible Editors, who was the last speaker and who spoke on Jewish learning in America.

At the close of the banquet a telegram was sent to Mr. Simon Miller, President of the Publication Society, who was prevented from attending the banquet by reason of the death of his father. The guests of honor were the following: Mr. and Mrs. Jacob H. Schiff, Dr. and Mrs. Schulman, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Stern, Mr. Oscar Straus, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Warburg, Dr. and Mrs. Cyrus Adler, Dr. and Mrs. Kaufman Kohler, Dr. Henry M. Lipziger, Dr. Max Margolis, Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson, Dr. and Mrs. Wm. Rosenau and Honorable Mayer Sulzberger.

The members of the General Committee tendered a dinner to the out-going President, the Hon. A. K. Cohen, at the Hotel Claridge, January 27, 1917. Preceding the dinner, the members of the Committee and their families were the hosts of the out-going President and Mrs. Cohen at a theater party. At the last meeting of the General Committee the following resolution was adopted, endorsing President Cohen's administration.

> "The Members of the General Committee desire at this last meeting before the annual session of the Grand Lodge, to give expression to their high appreciation of the valuable services rendered to the District by Brother Abraham K. Cohen as President, and to their friendship and esteem for him. He has zealously striven to strengthen the Order in the District and to widen its influence towards the attainment of the Order's high aims and ideals, to make the Order an active force in every movement for the advancement of Judaism, to encourage activities in the lodges, and to arouse its members to enthusiastic interest in the Order, its purposes and its work within and outside of the lodges. To this end, he has unstintingly devoted his time, energy and talent. He has been eminently successful. The membership has increased in number and new members are constantly being added to its rolls. The members are increasingly evidencing an active interest in its affairs and the Order in the District has distinctly advanced in the esteem of the members and of the community. He has most creditably represented the District on all public occasions, and has won the high regard of all our brethren. Every one of his colleagues on this committee cherishes for him the warmest feeling of friendship and sincere admiration. It is our hope that this Committee, the District and the Order may long have the benefit of his advice and co-operation".

The court is like a palace of marble; I mean that it is made up of very hard but very polished people.—La Bruyere.

B'NAI B'RITH AND THE JEWISH CONGRESS.

We are not aware of a single instance when the Order B'nai B'rith, in the course of its beneficent career, shall have risen to such heighth of its mission as an international Jewish organization as it did at the moment when it made the cause of the Jewish Congress its own cause.

The illustrious predecessors of Mr. Adolph Kraus in the president's chair have each had their strong points, but whether because of lack of opportunity or because of other reasons, none of them manifested such depth of vision, such thorough grasp of the situation as did Mr. Kraus. By his action he has lifted the organization which he serves to a leading position in the affairs of the entire Jewish people.

The war has brought on the severest crisis for the Jewish people. A union of scattered forces of all Israel becomes imperative for only by such union something could be accomplished. The task alone of properly bringing to the attention of the world's political leaders at the psychological moment the plight of the Jewish people requires all the moral and material support of a united Jewish people. Nothing less would suffice. And there are many strong Jewish organizations in America as well as in Europe which must all be drawn together for that purpose.

The question naturally arises: "Mi b'rosh?" Which one is to lead? Which of those organizations is most likely to express the wish of the majority of the Jewish people and less likely to impress its own caprice or theory upon the contemplated union?

It is a source of real satisfaction for all Jews who believe in fair play, and in the principles of democracy and justice that the B'nai B'rith have won the leading position. It seems almost providential that the new international role to be assumed by the Sons of the Covenant should so well fit its name.

The Order B'nai B'rith under its present administration has grown to be representative of various classes of Jews of many countries, and has its established branches in Europe as well as in the near orient. For this reason alone it is the fittest to crystallize the wish of all Israel.

It may be safely expected that the B'nai B'rith will find at the Jewish Congress the heartiest co-operation of the international Zionist organization, not because of any Zionist tendencies to be found in the B'nai B'rith, but because of its broadmindedness and impartiality. Israel is confronted by the gravest problem in its history of the last 2000 years—so grave that only the simplest terms must be employed when giving expression to it. For example, one of the questions before the congress will be whether the Jewish people should demand of the world the right to have a place in the sun—a right long conceded to every other national group—in addition to other human rights which all nations enjoy. The B'nai B'rith are the only Jewish body capable of approaching this question without preconceived notions, without obscuring it by theological or philosophical theories, and without moral cowardice, but apply to it merely the principles of justice and equality.

The action of the representatives of the B'nai B'rith at the conference of 140 at the Savoy Hotel indicated that the B'nai B'rith fully deserve to occupy the leading position at the coming Jewish Congress.—"Daily Jewish Courier."

THOUGHTS AND TIDINGS

Review of Passing Events

Russia and Roumania.

To uninitiated ears the above names may sound sweet and euphonious. To those who are not fully acquainted with the real powers behind the thrones of these two countries and have not learned to know from personal experience the machinations of their governments, the two combined names may perhaps sound as pleasant as the names of David and Jonathan, the two faithful friends of sacred history, or like Damon and Pythias, the names of the two inseparable cronies of fiction, who represent ideal friendship. But there are a great many persons in the world who have been unfortunate enough to come in closer contact with both of these countries, who have tasted the pangs of the knout in the one or the pain of the lash in the other, whose lives have been made miserable by the tyranny of the one or the harsh rule of the other, and to the ears of these victims the two names put together really sound neither more nor less than bear and hyena, the names of the two savage beasts of the forest which are very cruel, crafty and cunning. They sneak upon their prey and always attack those who are weaker than themselves.

To the world Russia and Roumania always seemed to be the best of friends. They really have many interests in common and many good reasons why they should walk hand in hand. Of the approximated six millions of the Roumanian population about five million belong to the Greek Catholic church, the same to which Russia belongs. Under the missrule and maladministrations which are the order of the day in both countries, these two are often disturbed by internal unrest, by incessant murmurs of the dissatisfied masses who are enslaved, robbed, bullied and brow-beaten by the greedy, arrogant and scheming politicians and high and low officials. The palaces of their ruling monarchs and of their ministers of state, and the mansions of their intriguing politicians are constantly in great need of lightning rods to divert the electrical currents of public rage and revolt that threaten every moment to strike and to destroy them. They frequently require scapegoats to carry away their sins and transgressions to some hidden nook, out of the sight of their duped subjects and out of the reach of the scrutiny of a bamboozled world. Both countries have more or less of a Jewish population, groups that belong to a people whose sons and daughters were always the waifs of the world, the play-balls of the nations, the puppets of the kings, the prey of the politicians, the burnt-offerings of the church, the meat of the masses, and the scapegoats of the priests and the prophets of Baal and Astarte, who always unloaded their sins of greed for gold, of longing for lust and of plotting for plunder upon the shoulders of the hapless Jews, who dragged the Jewish name in the dust and pilloried the entire Jewish people before the world as the embodiment of all that is iniquitous, vulgar, mean and low. Russia and Roumania still continue to use these tactics of treachery; they find it an easy method by which to cheat the masses of their birth rights and a successful system by which to blind the world. Both countries often throw their Jews to the murmuring masses, revolting rabbles and ignorant peasants as the desperate voyager who travels through a dense woods and is pursued by a pack of wolves will throw out his dog, his coat or his carriage robe to the ravenous beasts in order to distract their attention from himself and gain a chance for escape. They all know that there is not a single iota of truth in all their fearful accusations against the Jews, but what will a guilty culprit not do in order to escape from avenging justice?

Russia and Roumania have this regnant wicked interest of the convicted criminal in common, and to all appearance they were until recently two of the best bosom friends. A Roumanian prince was recently ready to release the overstocked matrimonial market of Tsarskoe Selo, the place of the royal summer residence of the Russian Czar, and to marry a Russian Grand Duchess. When Roumania decided to enter the present war on the side of the entente allies, Russia promised to aid her friend, Roumania, with men and ammunition. But it seems that perfidious Russia is too treacherous to remain faithful to any man or nation. I venture to assert that Russia will not [illegible] loyal to her wronged allies very [illegible]. And might have been ex[illegible] Russia betrayed her friend Roumania [illegible] the small little kingdom [illegible] mountain range in the lurch, to inevitable doom and destruction. Roumania, the bitterest hater and the unrelenting oppressor of the Jews, is almost completely wiped off of the map, the greater part of her army has been destroyed and the rest is either scattered or taken captive. Her cities are invested by her enemies, and her proud capital, gay Bucharest, the hot-bed of anti-Semitic outbreaks and bloody pogroms against the unfortunate Jews, is now occupied by the victorious foe. Her political dignitaries, her king and her princes, who have driven so many innocent Jews into exile, are now themselves drinking the same bitter cup of gall and are having a taste of how it feels to have to seek a new home and to have to beg a refuge from strangers in a strange land.

Does the Jew, when he gets acquainted with all these facts, become elated and filled with exuberant joy? Does he gloat over the fall of Roumania? I believe that I can readily answer these questions in the negative. The Jew is neither revengeful nor vindictive. His greatest religious teachers and wisest mentors of ethical conduct instruct and warn him not to fill his heart and soul with the venom of vengeance and direct him how to treat a fallen foe, in order to find favor in the eyes of God. Moses told in his most brilliantly eloquent parting address to his people that God said: "Mine are vengeance and recompense." The wise King Solomon states in his book of Proverbs: "If thy enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat, and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink. For though thou gatherest coals of fire upon his head, yet will the Lord repay it unto thee." The Jew walked through the ages with bleeding feet, wounded heart and tortured soul over the rocky roads of unrelenting persecution and the thorny paths of unending oppression. He carried the good book, which he valued more than his life, with him through all the bitter days and sorrowful nights. He never permitted himself to forget its precious teachings. The knowledge that he was always in the minority added practical prudence to his life and he quickly saw the wisdom of patience and endurance. He wandered on from exile to exile, from diaspora to diaspora, and the floods of tears which cruel kings and maddened mobs made him weep never extinguished his ardent love for his native land, wherever that happened to be. When he was only permitted to do it, he hastened to offer his life for the defense of the land of his birth. He often voluntarily opened wide his purse and poured out his hard-earned gold to replenish the treasury of the state that gave him scant protection and a meager portion of human rights. The least mitigation of his bitter lot fanned his love for his native land into greater flame, and no sacrifice was too great for him to lay upon the altar of the country where he made his home. Instead of vengeance he thought of love, and instead of vindictiveness he dreamed of brotherhood. Did the Jews of Germany, where anti-Semitism worked hard to deprive them of all their human rights, manifest a spirit of vengeance when in 1870 and in 1914 thousands of them joined voluntarily the German standards and marched away to the distant battlefields to fight bravely for their country and home? Did the Jews of Russia, the land of their sorrow and suffering, show a vindictive spirit when, at the outbreak of the present war, they voluntarily rushed by the thousands to the colors of Russia to fight valorously for their country?

When the Jew thinks of fallen Roumania the thought of vengeance does not enter his mind. He turns his thoughts to heaven and thanks God for the wholesome lesson which He is teaching to all the enemies of Israel. He thinks of Russia and Roumania as the rods which God has swung over him as He once lifted Assyria over Israel. Assyria has vanished. Roumania is blotted out and Russia must learn the lesson from Roumania that the day of reckoning, the awful day of God, is coming as it came for Babylon and Assyria and as it arrived for Roumania.

The Jewish Crisis.

Europe has lately passed through a regular avalanche of crises. England wrestled with a ministerial cabinet crisis, France tackled a military one, and Russia had to face a serious ministerial and a Duma crisis. A crisis generally means a critical turn in a disease; it is a turn either for better or for worse. In cases of physical disorder the attending physician can, as a rule, tell in a comparatively short time which way the distemper inclines, to the better or to the worse side. But in a political crisis it is not so easily told; it generally takes a longer time, until it can be stated with any assurance whether the turn of affairs has been to the benefit or to the detriment of the respective country.

The Jews of Eastern Europe have been for some time, and are still, going through a very grave crisis. Since the precipitation of the present world-war they have been and are still suffering from a complication of serious troubles. There is much cause for anxiety. For them it is positively a question of to be or not to be, will they survive or, God beware, not survive? Nearly half of the Jews of the world are involved in this grave crisis and the rest of their coreligionists are anxiously watching and waiting to ascertain what the outcome of this Jewish crisis is going to be. The American Jews are now preparing to take steps to obtain an adequate and efficient remedy by which to bring to the eastern Jews effective aid and assistance that will relieve the pressure of poverty, which is the main cause of their sufferings. It will give them a chance to gather strength enough to withstand the ravages of the attacks, and may ultimately save them from utter annihilation. The Jews of Eastern Europe are now positively helpless. They look to their brethren in America, especially to them who live in the United States, to extend to them a helping hand in their distress and danger. The real cure is in the hand of God, who is the guardian of Israel, and we all look up to him in hope and in trust that he will not permit destruction to enter the house of Israel and will soon bless us all with lasting peace.

The Old Old Story.

Some of the war correspondents of the present world-war cannot leave the Jews alone. Even American-born reporters, who are at one front or another, do once in a while insert in the letters to their respective papers some knock at the Jews. They all seem to delight in besmearching the fair Jewish name and to poison public opinion against the Jewish people. Carl Wigand, an American war correspondent, who was on the Roumanian front, recently reported that many of the Jewish soldiers of the Roumanian army are deserting and are eager to be taken as captives. It is the old, old story over and over again. The same thing has been said time and again of the Jewish soldiers of the Russian armies, and each time these stories were nailed down as a deliberate lie. No doubt the stories about the Jewish soldiers of Roumania are also made up of the same cloth.

But the mischief has been done. If the B'nai B'rith Defamation League could reach these roaming knights of the quill they could perhaps be induced to retract and to refrain from repeating everything they happen to hear from anti-Semitic colleagues or gay Jew-baiting army lieutenants. Alas, they are too far gone, or gone too far and cannot be reached by Brother Livingston or Brother Lewis or the Defamation League. But what about our American newspapers, which print such stories so carelessly, without examination or investigation? We certainly are entitled to expect them to be decent and respectable.

AGRICULTURE FOR IMMIGRANTS.

Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America Opens Agricultural Bureau.

An important activity, which promises to be very useful, has been added to those of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America.

The Bureau of Agriculture has as its main object the encouragement and aiding of Jewish immigrants to settle on farms, and thus help them to establish themselves in a calling in which they will find a livelihood and independence.

The activity includes the formation of classes in agriculture, which have already been started, the direction of lecture courses, and the giving of information on the subject, both personally and by mail. Later the work will be practically demonstrated at an experiment station centrally located.

Civics and naturalization work will also be included and the work of Americanization, now and for many years a feature of the Society's work, will be extended to those farmers who are desirous of obtaining their naturalization papers.

The work is directed from the main office of the Society, 229 E. Broadway, and is under the supervision of Judge Leon Sanders, the president of the Society, and Mr. B. Shelvin, chairman of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. Nathan Cohen, formerly assistant secretary of the Federation of Jewish Farmers of America and associate editor of the "Jewish Farmer," is in charge of the new bureau.

ANNUAL CONVENTION D. G. L. No. 5.

of the President's message touching upon the proposed American Jewish Congress. A gathering of American Jews of all affiliations that is to be called at some time in the future to formulate a suitable declaration which the nations will be asked to consider in their peace conferences, to the end that the Jews and other people oppressed by certain backward governments may be given full civic and religious freedom.

The Order of B'nai B'rith was instrumental in eliminating the differences that threatened to block the whole congress movement, and has assumed a leading part in the preliminaries.

In the evening all of the delegates and officers were guests at the various homes of the local members and afterwards, accompanied by the officers of the lodge, they attended a concert given by Alma Gluck.

Tuesday Sessions.

The concluding session of the convention was held on Tuesday morning, and after prayer was offered, the consideration of various reports was resumed. Propaganda within the District was one of the main topics of discussion, and the incoming administration was authorized to utilize all the means at its command with a view of increasing the numerical strength of the District.

An invitation was presented from Charleston, S. C., to hold next year's convention in that city. The invitation was referred to the incoming General Committee with the recommendation to give the same favorable consideration.

The election of officers was declared the final order of business. The following are the officers elected to serve for the ensuing term:

President—Edwin L. Levy, Richmond, Virginia.

Secretary—Dr. George Solomon, Savannah, Ga.

Treasurer—H. Sternberg, Greensboro, N. C.

The convention was attended by over one hundred delegates, representing lodges in the states of Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, Florida and the District of Columbia.

After prayer by Rabbi Frank Rosenthal, the meeting adjourned sine die.

THE NEW AUSTRIAN EMPEROR AND THE JEWS OF AUSTRIA.

The new Austrian Emperor, Karl, received, in the presence of his wife, a large deputation of Jewish communities who had come to pay homage to him. The leaders were the president of the Vienna religious community, Dr. Alfred Stern, and the chief Rabbi, Dr. Gudemann. After Dr. Gudemann had blessed the young imperial pair in the Hebraic and Yiddish languages, Dr. Stern made a patriotic speech, to which the emperor replied as follows:

"The homage paid the empress and myself by the representatives of the Israelitish religious communities in the name of all co-religionists, we accept with real gratitude.

"The Jewish people have always shown love and attachment to my house and the fatherland; they have helped, by willingly sacrificing life and property, and with God's merciful assistance, in the successes of the present important time.

"Just as I am convinced of the steadfastness of this patriotic sentiment, your co-religionists may be assured that in my land they will be able to enjoy without any restriction the rights granted to all citizens.

"Moved by the benedictions which you ask God to send down on me and mine, in your places of worship, we pay you, also for these pious evidences of your sincere feelings, our warmest thanks."

HONORS FOR JEWISH OFFICERS.

The new list of honors distributed by the King of England includes several Jewish names. Among these are those of Brigadier General Seligman, Lieutenant Colonel Harold A. Cohen, Lieutenant Colonel F. D. Samuel and Captain Dr. Myer Coplans, all of whom have been awarded the Distinguished Service Order. The military grades of the recipients are in themselves a remarkable testimony to the large part which the Jews of England are taking in the present war. Captain T. H. Sebag-Montefiore and Lieutenant Herbert H. Marks won the Military Cross.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PHILADELPHIA.

Anniversary Celebration By Lincoln Lodge.

Lincoln Lodge No. 780 celebrated its first anniversary with a banquet at Hotel Walton on Thursday evening, January 4th, 1917. Although organized but a year ago by the efforts of Brothers David Phillips and Joseph Kuhn, the lodge now numbers over 150 members. The banquet room was artistically decorated and on one of its walls "Lincoln Lodge" glowed in large electric lights. The banquet was graced by the presence of ladies and there were seated at individual tables upwards of 225 persons. A number of guests, officers of the District Grand Lodge and out-of-town members, were present. Among those present were Mr. Abe Weil, Past President of the District, and Mrs. Weil; Mr. Meyerhoff, Treasurer of the District, and Mrs. Meyerhoff; Mr. David Bortin, First Vice-President of the District, and Mrs. Bortin; Mr. Joseph W. Salus of Atlantic City, Past President of the District, and Mrs. Salus, and Harry S. Platofsky, member of the General Committee.

Prior to the toasts, a number of musical selections were rendered by members of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. David Bortin responded to the toast, "Our Order;" Rabbi Martin Nathan to the toast, "Our Jewish Ideals," and Joseph W. Salus, in a witty vein, to the toast, "Our Ladies." The toastmaster was Mr. David Phillips.

The affair was one of the most enjoyable held under the auspices of the lodge, and it was announced that several events of interest would be held in the near future. The banquet was followed by a dance.

Annual Meeting of Joshua Lodge.

With an attendance of over 150 members, Joshua Lodge No. 23, closed a successful year with its annual meeting held on December 20. During the year the membership of the lodge was increased over 100 per cent, the lodge now having a membership of over 700.

Special order of business was election of officers.

Installation of officers was held at the meeting of the lodge on January 17 at the Y. M. H. A. Building. Preceding the meeting a conference of the officers and trustees was held at which plans were discussed for the current year. These included consideration of Social Service work, including prison aid, and big brother movement, which are well under way.

B'nai B'rith Charity Ball.

Under the auspices of Joshua, Har Sinai and Lincoln Lodges, of Philadelphia, a meeting was held on Monday evening, January 15, at which arrangements were made for the holding of a charity ball on Monday evening, April 2, at the Horticultural Hall, Philadelphia.

This is the first joint affair to be given under the auspices of the Philadelphia lodges. The purpose is to make this an annual event, the proceeds to be devoted to charitable purposes. The meeting was well attended and preparations were immediately begun for a most elaborate affair. Various sub-committees were named, which are to be augmented from time to time as occasion may require.

The enthusiasm manifested by those present and the interest shown by the men who are among the leaders of Jewish affairs of the city, make it apparent that the coming event will be an unqualified success. The committee decided to open permanent headquarters where the various sub-committees can meet and transact their business. The chairman of the General Committee is Mr. David Bortin.

Joshua Lodge, No. 23.

A meeting of Joshua Lodge was held at the Y. M. H. A. Hall on Wednesday, January 17th, at which business of exceptional importance was transacted. The officers for the ensuing year were installed and various standing committees were appointed. The committees on B'nai B'rith Ball, Prison Aid, and Membership Campaign, made extended reports.

The project for the erection of a B'nai B'rith building met with an enthusiastic reception. The new administration, headed by Mr. Jay Solis Cohen, has promised to use its best efforts to further the interests of the lodge and the Order by live-wire policies.

TUCSON, ARIZ.

At a regular meeting of Tucson Lodge No. 763 of Tucson, Ariz., the officers for the ensuing year were elected. The sum of $132.00 was collected during the meeting for the benefit of the European war sufferers. Through the effort of President S. B. Goodman and a committee of the lodge a mortgage on the Temple amounting to $2,000.00 was paid. The lodge is doing good work among the Jewish people in the community, and considering the number of Jewish inhabitants the lodge has proven a valuable factor in the shaping of the affairs of Jewish interest.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

Several hundred members and their ladies were present at the B'nai B'rith Building Sunday evening, January 14, 1917, to celebrate the 53rd anniversary of Cleveland Lodge No. 16 and to dedicate the Martin A. Marks Memorial Library. Mr. George I. Wirple presented the Martin A. Marks Memorial Library to the lodge in behalf of the Committee and Dr. Daniel Huebsch accepted it for the lodge and also on behalf of the family of Mr. Marks.

The speakers present on the occasion were Karl Vetsburg of St. Louis, President of District Grand Lodge No. 2; Sidney Kusworm of Dayton, member of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge; A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary of the Order, and Jacob Furth of St. Louis, member of the Executive Committee of the Order, who delivered the principal address and installed the officers of the lodge. Other visitors from out of town were William Ornstein, Victor Abraham and J. J. Levy of Cincinnati, all officers of the Grand Lodge; L. Bornstein of Indianapolis, First Vice-President of the District Grand Lodge, and Joseph Stampfer of St. Louis, member of the General Committee.

Cleveland Lodge was organized 53 years ago and of the original charter members there are but two living at the present time, of which one, Brother A. Wiener, was present and recited some of the earlier happenings in the history of the lodge. After the formal ceremony of installation, dancing was indulged in.

On Thursday evening, January 25, 1917, Dr. Aaron Hahn lectured on the subject, "The Influence of the Jew Upon the Civilization of War". A musical program was also rendered.

On Saturday evening, January 20, the B'nai B'rith Juniors gave a sleigh ride party.

The House Warming Party held on Saturday, January 13, 1917, by the B'nai B'rith Juniors, was well attended and proved an artistic success. Refreshments and dancing concluded a most enjoyable evening.

The I. O. B. B. Bowling Team has been reorganized for the remainder of the season with four teams. A special Bowling series was held on Wednesday evening, January 24, between the Cleveland Umpires and the B'nai B'rith All Stars.

A class in salesmanship was successfully formed by the members of the B'nai B'rith at the club building on Thursday, January 25, 1917, under the direction of Mr. Samuel Davis. The class will be open to members as well as non-members and a series of lectures have been arranged for.

As the result of a lecture given by Mr. Mook, Scout Commissioner of Cleveland, a class for scout masters has been formed at a meeting called for that purpose on Tuesday evening, January 9, 1917.

On Sunday afternoon, January 14th, a meeting was held for the purpose of selecting talent for a play to be given in the near future.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

At a meeting of Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, held on Jan. 22, a reference to President Wilson's address to the Senate evoked enthusiastic and long continued applause.

The lodge is planning elaborate entertainments for the delegates of the District Grand Lodge which will be held in that city in May.

A feature of the meeting was an interesting talk by Robert Marx, describing his month of service as a volunteer in the U. S. Navy, closing with an eloquent appeal to the patriotism of his hearers to give their support to all plans for a greater navy. Judging from the nature of the applause with which the remarks were received, the speaker expressed the views of practically every one of his hearers.

Other speakers at the banquet were Bro. Herman Asher, of New York, past president of District No. 1, Rabbi Samuel H. Goldensohn, Rabbi of Temple Beth Emeth, of Albany, and Bro. Maurice P. ADULLAM LODGE, NO. 326, PITTSFIELD, MASS.

At the regular monthly meeting of Adullam Lodge, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, Monday evening, many applications for membership were received. Ten applications were passed upon, and consideration of the remainder postponed until the next meeting.

Plans were announced of a patriotic meeting under the joint auspices of the Intellectual Advancement and Entertainment Committees to be held in the afternoon of Washington's Birthday.

The entertainment and dance on Feb. 1, at Osceola Hall, under the auspices of Adullam Lodge, I. O. B. B., promises to be a very pleasant and enjoyable one. Myles W. Illingworth will entertain with original character impersonations—juggling, magic art and humorous readings. The entertainment will open at 8 p.m.; dancing about 9:30.

Bro. Leo Zander, District deputy and president of Adullam Lodge, has complete charge of all arrangements and there is no question that the entertainment will be a great success.

IRON RANGE LODGE, CHISHOLM, MINN.

In response to an invitation of Iron Range Lodge, No. 793, Bro. Milton P. Firestone, of St. Paul, Minn., officially visited the lodge at its meeting held in Hibbing, Mich., on Sunday, Jan. 14, 1917, and attended its B'nai B'rith Day celebration.

During the afternoon a regular meeting of the lodge was held at which initiation of candidates took place.

The attendance was good, almost every member of the lodge being present, and Brother Firestone addressed the members of the lodge on "The Work of the Order."

In the evening a banquet was held, at which Bro. Charles D. Oreckovsky, of Duluth, acted as toastmaster. Brother Firestone again addressed the audience on the "Higher Aims of the Order and Its Future Work." After the close of the banquet the officers were installed by Brother Oreckovsky and the program was brought to a close with a dance.

During the day Brother Firestone offered his services to the lodge to visit prospective members and was to his surprise informed that there was only one man the lodge would like to secure but who has repeatedly declined the invitation to join the lodge. Nevertheless at the banquet this particular gentleman was in attendance and voluntarily signed a petition to become a member of the lodge.

At the suggestion of Brother Firestone, the lodge appointed a committee to assist in the fight in the passage of the bill before the Legislature, to prevent the reading of the bible in the public schools.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY.

The coming month of January will be signalized throughout the southern districts of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith by stimulating celebrations of B'nai B'rith Day, and the communities which give themselves whole-heartedly to such observance not only give impetus to activities on the high plane of service and brotherhood, but honor themselves. There are two distinct influences in the life of the Order. One is the influence of altruism which makes it the highest boast of the true Ben B'rith that the Order does not appeal to any selfish need, but gives its membership the fine opportunity to be helpful to others. The other influence leads to Jewish self-expression and to the high hope that the Order shall grow into a stronger Jewish brotherhood, with a deeper Jewish consciousness and an exalted Jewish aim.

It is to be hoped that the orators who, throughout the southern communities, shall stir the latent loyalty of the members of the Order, shall emphasize this two-fold interest. To say that the aim of the B'nai B'rith is only altrustic is to utter a half truth. To say that it is only a Jewish brotherhood for the sake of self-defense or self-expression is to narow the broad appeal the Order can make. To put squarely before the men of Israel the strength and unity of an inclusive brotherhood devoted at the same time to the high principles of social serving is to express a truth of which the bare statement should be an irresistible appeal.—E. W. L., in "Jewish Spectator".

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

On Dec. 12, Etham Lodge, No. 37, of Sacramento, held an interesting open meeting under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committee. NOAH LODGE WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS.

A large crowd greeted Dr. M. Faber, of Tyler, Texas, on the occasion of the B'nai B'rith Day celebration, under the auspices of the lodge, held on Jan. 21, 1917.

Dr. Faber spoke on "Purpose of B'nai B'rith Day" and in eloquent terms told of the achievements of the Order and the purpose of the day in remembering the Order and its accomplishments. The oration was a splendid exposition of the ideals of B'nai B'rithism. Mr. Philip Kleinman presided and in a becoming manner introduced the speaker of the evening. Resolutions of thanks were passed thanking Dr. Faber for his services, as well as Dr. Fox, the chairman of the Cultural Advancement Committee, for sending him.

HOREB LODGE, NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

The officers of Horeb Lodge No. 25 have issued their Sixtieth Annual Report of the lodge covering its activities for the year 1916.

During the year the lodge has as usual taken the leading part in all the activities and movements for the betterment of the Jewish people as a whole and especially of those of New Haven. No communal work is begun until it has the co-operation and support of the lodge, and when this is obtained success is assured.

The membership of the lodge at the beginning of the year was 598 and at the close of the year it numbered 676, showing a healthy gain for the period. The lodge expended during the year for charitable and educational purposes the sum of $4,420.43. The lodge funds amount to $7,613.79.

The fourth annual commemoration of B'nai B'rith Day and installation of officers of Dacotah Lodge, No. 731, at Grand Forks, N. D., took place on Sunday, Jan. 21.

The day was ushered in by the arrival of the Grand Lodge representative, Bro. Hiram D. Frankel, of St. Paul, Minn. The forenoon of the day was spent in informal conference between the local brethren and the Grand Lodge representative. The prospective work to be undertaken by the lodge locally was considered from different points of view.

The afternoon session began with the general meeting of the lodge, Bro. Geo. Papermaster presiding. As the work of the term of office now drawing to a close was reviewed by the reports of the standing committees and retiring officers, Brother Frankel took occasion to comment upon the ways and methods that were used by those in charge to cope with the problems before the lodge. His suggestions will prove of great value to the lodge in the future. Bro. Max Rabinovitch, at present State Deputy for North Dakota, submitted his report and pointed out how the work of B'nai B'rithdom has progressed during the past year.

At 6 o'clock a banquet was arranged for the members and their ladies in the Frederick Hotel in honor of the visitors and the guest of the lodge, Bro. H. D. Frankel. After a delicious repast all present repaired to a merry feast of wit and humor. Bro. George Papermaster, the retiring president of the lodge, acting toastmaster lead the happy jesters.

The following program of toasts followed the announcement by Bro. Max Rabinovitch that the orators should be given a time limit:

1. The Founders—Our Past. Bro. Selig Wolff
2. The State of North Dokota—Our Present......Bro. Max Rabinovitch
3. The Outlook—Our Future. Bro. Sam Friedman
4. The Visitors—Our Welcome. Bro. K. V. Brooks
5. The Ladies—Our Friends. Bro. Wm. Brooks
6. Our Guest........Bro. H. D. Frankel
7. Auf Wiedersehn. Bro. Geo. Papermaster

"The winds of Heaven never fanned;
The circling sunlight never spanned
The borders of a fairer land
Than our own U. S. A."

After the banquet all retired once more to the lodge rooms, where a public installation of officers was held. Upon assuming his duties, Bro. Pres. Sam Friedman called upon Bro. Max Rabinovitch for an address. Brother Rabinovitch took this occasion to present in behalf of the members of the lodge to Bro. George Papermaster, the retiring president of the lodge, with a handsome goldheaded umbrella bearing the inscriptions of the lodge as a token of the high esteem and sincere appreciation entertained by all the brethren of the lodge for his untiring efforts in behalf of our Order. In accepting the gift, Brother Papermaster thanked the brethren for their sincere co-operation in the past and appealed for a continued union of efforts for the attainment of the ideals of the Order.

After appointing the Standing Committees for the ensuing term, Bro. Sam Friedman caled upon Bro. Hiram D. Frankel who responded with a lecture upon the subject entitled "The Simplest Faith." During the course of his address Bro. Frankel pointed out from a comparative and analytical viewpoint wherein Judaism is the simplest faith on earth. He went further to show that the principles of the B'nai B'rith are such that every Jew should practice because they are as broad as the faith itself.

Following the address the remaining hours of the evening were devoted to informal dancing, while refreshments were served in the intervals.

TACOMA LODGE, TACOMA, WASH.

One of the largest Jewish gatherings assembled in Tacoma witnessed a public installation of the officers of Tacoma Lodge No. 741, held in the Masonic Temple on Jan. 11, 1917.

The ceremonies were conducted by Past President Bro. Julius Shafer, District Deputy for Seattle, and the close attention of the audience indicated the impressiveness of the work. The principal participants in the ceremony, all appearing in evening dress, added much solemnity and dignity to the occasion. A number of officers and members of the lodges of Seattle accompanied Deputy [illegible] on his trip to Tacoma.

GALA DAY FOR DISTRICT NO. 3, I. O. B. B.—THE ENDOWMENT DUE EACH MEMBER PAID IN FULL, PLUS A DIVIDEND.

The final meeting of the Commissioners of The Widow and Orphan Endowment Fund was held on Sunday, Jan. 21, 1917, when 237 checks for $400 each were issued to the surviving members of this Fund, according to the law enacted at a special meeting in Atlantic City in May, 1902, which read:

"When said Fund reaches the sum of four hundred dollars for each living member, it shall be apportioned, and cease to exist."

In addition to this, there remained a surplus of $3,850, which was divided equally among the surviving members, amounting to $16.55 as a dividend to each.

After the adjournment of the Commissioners, the Treasurer, M. S. Myerhoff, tendered them, as also the officers of the District (who had been invited for this memorable event), a farewell supper, his guests being the following:

Frederick Jay, President of the District.

Marcus Feuchtwanger, First Vice-President.

David Bortin, Second Vice-President.

Louis Sulzbacher, Secretary.

E. A. Marcus, Chairman, Endowment Commissioners.

Moses Hecht.

S. Moskowitz.

Jacob Gellert.

The occasion marked the most wonderful result of any fraternal insurance organization ever experienced; its members paid but eighteen dollars annual contribution; this very favorable closing can only be attributed to the great care and constant attention of the Treasurer, M. S. Myerhoff, who for the past 13 years gave his entire time to attain this end.

This also is an epoch in the history of District No. 3, in that it is the first occurrence where a death benefit was paid during the life of insured, and in addition thereto, receiving a dividend.

Addresses complimenting the successful efforts of Brother Myerhoff, in the management of the trust confided to his care, were made by those signally honored as witnesses to this remarkable occurrence.

Letters of congratulation and complimentary to Brother Myerhoff were read from Past Presidents of the District, and a number of lodges. After enjoying a bountiful repast, the guests departed for their homes, happy in the knowledge that henceforth District No. 3 will carry into practice the unselfish principles and the life of sacrifice which are idealistic of the INDEPENDENT ORDER B'NAI B'RITH.

McKEESPORT LODGE, McKEESPORT, PA.

In response to a pledge of the delegates of McKeesport Lodge, No. 573, made at the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 3, held last August in the city of Erie, Pa., Brother Henry Friedman, Eugene Krow and F. R. S. Kaplan addressed the lodge at a well-attended meeting on Sunday, December 17th, regarding the pledge to contribute $500 to the Erie Orphanage. As a result of their joint appeal, a sum exceeding $700 was secured within a short time during the meeting of the lodge and this amount was forwarded to the Erie Orphanage.

On Sunday, January 7th, 1917, Brother Mark Alexander of Pittsburgh, a member of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge, installed the officers of the lodge.

On Sunday, January 21st, 1917, at a meeting of the lodge, the President thereof, Brother Jacob L. Nayhouse, presented to the lodge a beautiful cover for the altar, which is an artistic and costly piece of work and was much appreciated by the members of the lodge.

McKeesport Lodge No. 573, was organized in the spring of 1904, mainly through the efforts of Mr. Louis Sulzbacher, of Braddock, Secretary of the District Grand Lodge, and the lodge was duly instituted on April 24th of that year. Its membership at that time numbered 52.

Prior to the organization of Temple B'nai Israel, the lodge for a number of years maintained a Sabbath School of over one hundred children. With the inauguration of the Social Service work of the Order, the members of the lodge have become "Big Brothers" to many of the young Jewish boys of the community. Club rooms are being maintained by the lodge for the benefit of its members as well as other organizations and the club rooms are entirely operated and are in charge of members of the lodge. Under the auspices of the lodge a number of noted Jewish leaders delivered messages to the people of McKeesport; among them Professor Gotthard Hard of the Hebrew Union College of Cincinnati, Rabbi A. H. Silver of Wheeling, W. Va., and Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director of the Order, and many others.

The membership of the lodge has almost increased fourfold, numbering now over 175.

MASSACHUSETTS LODGE, BOSTON, MASS.

During the year 1916, Massachusetts Lodge, No. 27, of Boston, Mass., as a result of the concerted efforts of its officers and members, is in a position to show a gain of over five hundred per cent in its membership. At the annual meeting of the lodge, Bro. Richard Herman, retiring president of the lodge, submitted a report as to the lodge's activity during the year. We quote from his report as follows:

"It must indeed be gratifying to you, as it is to me, to compare the present number of our membership with that number as it stood a year ago.

"Even the spirit of our organization has gained in volume and in intensity, until now it animates and inspires every one of us. I venture to say that there is not within hearing of my voice a single man who feels indifferent to the aims and purpose of the B'nai B'rith. On the contrary we are all anxious and willing to co-operate in the taxing and praiseworthy work of the Order. When we enter the lodge room there is apparent to each of us an atmosphere not only of cordiality but of real deep-rooted friendship, yet seriousness of purpose. True democracy rules in our midst. The young men feel at home with the old and vice-versa. Good-fellowship has come among us to stay, but I must remind you, Brethren, that our aims as an organization are serious ones. It is not enough that we come here and enjoy each other's society socially, we must adopt a progressive constructive platform to the end that we may not only be able to talk about the things that we are going to do; but so that we may in fact point to accomplishments actually achieved."

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.

Paradise Lodge, No. 237, held an unusually well attended meeting on Sunday evening, Jan. 14, 1917, on which occasion the officers for the ensuing term were installed by District Deputy, Bro. L. In the evening a banquet was served by the Jewish ladies to about 100 members of the Order and guests.

Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee of Chicago, Social Service Director of the Order, was the principal speaker, addressing the gathering on the subject, "New B'nai B'rith Work."

Doctor Coffee, in his remraks, spoke in a general way of the new movements which are sweeping over Judaism in this and other countries. He emphasized the bond of democracy in our Order, which is found in the first word "Independent." Every member of our Order is independent and free to carry out his religious practices. We ask no questions about his synagogue affiliation. All our members may think along lines of independence, but within our ranks there must be "Order." Whatever our private opinions, we must stand in the lodge room as a united body, working for the betterment of Israel. As members of the B'nai B'rith, we must emphasize our Jewishness. The Jewish citizens of Connellsville owe a great debt to the city wherein they live. They are free and can rear their children under a blessed form of government. In return, they must give the city the finest citizenship they possess. In closing, emphasis was laid upon the Social Service Department and the Anti-Defamation League. The men were told just how, in their community they could assist in these national movements.

Class Initiation.

On Saturday evening, Jan. 20, 1917, the monster class initiation, under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council was held at the Hotel La Salle. A membership campaign was waged for one month, during which 597 candidates were secured. Of this number 334 were present at the class initiation. It was very gratifying that 211 members participated in the campaign, and although the number secured does not compare favorably with the result of the campaign of the preceding year, the Committee feels satisfied, for the reason that at the same time while this campaign was in operation, a similar campaign was conducted by the Associated Jewish Charities of this city to secure members for that organization.

Initiation ceremonies were conducted by the Degree Team of the Central B'nai B'rith Council, consisting of Bros. Edward Sonnenschein, A. D. Weiner, Harry Okin and A. B. Seelenfreund.

At the close of the ceremonies, Bro. Sigmund Livingston of Bloomington, Ill., past president of the District Grand Lodge and chairman of the Anti-Defamation League, was presented. He addressed the audience on the subject, "The Jew in Public Opinion." His address, although lasting more than an hour, held the audience in rapt attention and he was given an ovation at the close.

The class initiation was graced by the presence of the president of the Order, Mr. Adolf Kraus, the president of the District, Dr. H. I. Davis, and a number of officers and members of the Grand Lodge. Altogether there were more than 1500 members and candidates present, and it was a remarkable sight when that body of men rose to welcome the new class of members initiated.

Brother Boettigheimer reviewed the history of the Order from its inception and in eloquent words descried the various monuments erected by the Order as a result of its philanthropic and charitable endeavors. At the close of his address short talks were delivered by Bros. Dr. H. I. Davis, A. B. Seelenfreund and others.

HARDENBERG LODGE, FRANKFURT ON ODER.

Hardenberg Lodge of Frankfort on the Oder reports that the meeting of the lodge held Oct. 26, 1916, was honored by the visit of the Brother Grand President of District No. 8, brethren from neighboring towns and a number of sisters from the Ladies' Auxiliary Lodge.

The meeting took place in the rooms owned by the lodge, which were acquired by the board of officers during the year 1914, the first year of the war.

Most of the work, in the field of benevolence, the lodge has naturally done in connection with the war. The lodge has participated in the outfitting of the Hospital Train, in the relief of the Jews in East Prussia and Alsacia, in alleviating the distress in Poland and Galicia and the distress in Poland and Galicia and in rendering aid in Palestine and Minor Asia.

It often sent friendly gifts to brethren in the field, and has entertained, especially in the beginning of the war, Jewish soldiers of the Frankfort garrison during the holidays.

A great number of lectures and reports were arranged and communication with the brethren of the neighboring towns was maintained. The lodge places its meeting rooms at the disposal of Youth's Union and the Jewish Literary Society.

It has added eight new members to the first sixty and has lost two—a father and his son—by death, so that the present member of the lodge is 67. Eighteen of these are serving in the war, 7 are at the front, one is a prisoner of war, one fell on the field of honor, 23 sons and 4 sons-in-law of the members are in the war service.

ANNUAL BANQUET BY OAKLAND LODGE, OF OAKLAND, CAL.

The annual banquet and installation of officers of Oakland Lodge No. 252, of Oakland, Cal., was held on Tuesday evening, Jan. 9, 1917.

Mr. Morris Mazor, retiring president, officiated as Master of Ceremonies, presiding at the banquet and introducing the various speakers with appropriate remarks. During the evening the new officers were formally installed. This was followed by the appointment of committees, transaction of necessary routine business and presentation of a testimonial to the outgoing president by the lodge members in token of his good work on behalf of the Order during the past year. Among the speakers of the evening were Judge George Samuels, Judge Isadore F. Golden, Past President of the District Grand Lodge, I. J. Ascheim, Secretary of the Grand Lodge, Gus Ringolsky, Past President of the Grand Lodge, and Benjamin Shapiro. The principal address was delivered by Judge Golden who, in his remarks, declared that the European war was exterminating the Jewish people and appealed to the Jews of America to conserve their energies and finances for the rehabilitation process which will follow the ending of the great struggle.

Judge Golden, in his address, said:

"Sometimes a man gets impressions from the surroundings in which he finds himself. Personally I am very keenly alive to impressionistic surroundings. Here I find a wonderful transformation in the Oakland lodge—an exemplification of that something which is eternal in Judaism. This lodge in its work, is a true reflex of the Jew as he is.

"We are the oldest people in the world with the oldest civilization in the world, yet today we are the youngest people with the youngest civilization. We were here when the dawning sunlight first cast its radiance upon the peoples of the earth, and we will be here when the curtain is finally rung down.

"Israel is today undergoing a tremendous transformation. We are experimenting along racial and economic lines. We are reviving and recreating Jewish civilization in a land that has been a desert, reviving the pioneer spirit that has made the Jewish people one of the greatest in the world. In Europe today more than 80 per cent of Judaism is facing annihilation and extermination. The Jews are fighting with the English, with the French, the Russians and the Germans. As a race they are losing numbers in all directions. Nothing in the whole history of the world has so threatened the whole existence of the Jewish race as the terrors of this great world conflict.

"There can be no peace, for the present, because there can be no negotiations for peace—no middle ground upon which the warring nations can stand. It is a fight to a finish on all sides. But let me warn you, that as sure as there is an Almighty power presiding over the destinies of all mankind, just so certainly must the men who started the war render an accounting for that which they have done.

Fighting for Thrones.

"Right now, the reigning families of Europe are fighting, not for territorial acquisitions, but for their jobs, for their very existences. When peace has been declared and the people have asked who is responsible for the slaughter that has taken place, it means the downfall of the monarchies of the world, and there will be no real peace until something is shown in return for the havoc they have wrought.

"No country needs money to make war. All it needs is to impound its natural resources and make war with these resources. The time is not far distant, in Europe today, when the women and children will be serving their time on the battlefront—an impounded resource. As long as there is military autocracy men and women and children can be compelled to fight.

"In the world struggle there are more than 700,000 Jews under arms, in the various contending countries, and they are desolating each other. The efforts of forty centuries of struggle to keep together as a unit the Jewish peoples of the earth are being wiped out in less than two years. As a matter of fact, the only Jews in the world left untouched are the Jews of America. If the warring nations, for self protection of waning resources, are compelled to disregard the lines of international right, we too may find outselves entangled in the titanic struggle, for we are coming more and more to realize that an ignoble peace is worse than war—a thousand times.

"There do come periods in the history of a people, when war is perferable to peace. For 5,000 years the Jew has been willing to offer his life when such an occasion arose. Europe is going to be bankrupt after this war is over and the Jew is going to be worse than bankrupt. In the United States 2,000,000 Jews are going to face the problem of being called upon to meet and discharge the obligation of maintaining for an indefinite period the Jews of Europe and Palestine who will be left.

Big Fund is Needed.

"Tens of millions of dollars will be needed for the work. Yours is the obligation if you would be true to the principles of Judaism and are not hypocrites, for Judaism has always meant to the race and the world the ultimate in sacrifice. The world's coming Jewish problem is so universal and so colossal that it must be borne by the Jews of America.

"You will have to pay by the voluntary income tax. Month by month and year by year you will have to pay as a voluntary donation a tax similar to that imposed by the United States government. In New York the word has gone forth that $10,0000,000 is needed for the immediate future, to enable the Jews of this country to pay for the relief and existence of their own kith and kin in the war zone. There will be no exemptions in this income tax—each must bear his proportion. It should be recognized as a holy opportunity.

"This, today, is the situation that we must face—to resolve, out of our abundance, to pay some modicum for the benefit of the world Jews who are fighting for the world existence of the race. This should be the dominant note of your activities in the immediate future."

Judge Golden was followed by Secretary I. J. Ascheim, who, in his brief address on "The Jew of Today", touched upon prohibitiion as follows:

"Prohibition, while it may fit some people, does not fit the Jew. The Jew is supposed to enjoy the good things of the earth as they are afforded by the Almighty. He consecrates his religion and receives his Sabbaths with a cup of wine in his hand; he bids adieu with a cup of wine in his hand. In no phase of prohibition is there anything consonant with the Jew. One of our problems of today is not to be misled by the clamor which is in existence in this country at the present time."

The affair was one of the largest of its kind ever held by the lodge and was attended by many persons prominent on both sides of the Bay. It was the principal social function of the lodge, and partook of the nature of a big Jewish reunion. Members of the Grand Lodge, visiting members from other lodges and guests to the number of more than 200 were present at the joint function. Pledges of good will, closer alliances and unified efforts were made by the assembled members as the keynote of the occasion.

HERZL LODGE, HOUSTON, TEXAS.

Herzl Lodge, No. 608, held its regular monthly meeting, Wednesday evening, Jan. 3, 1917, at which the installation of officers for the ensuing term took place. The installation was presided over by Bro. S. J. Westheimer.

Several members were initiated, and a number of applicants were elected to membership.

Refreshments and cigars were served. The Ball Committee reported that the Chanucka Ball was a social and financial success.

The B'nai B'rith Day Committee reported that the celebration will take place on Sunday, Jan. 21, 1917.

Brother Bernstein, of Shreveport, La., will be the principal speaker.

In spite of the inclement weather there was a large and enthusiastic attendance, and after an enjoyable evening the meeting adjourned.

TULSA, OKLA.

Tulsa Lodge, No. 798, of Tulsa, Okla., was instituted last October and now has a membership of over 75 and hopes to reach the 100 mark in the near future.

The lodge is becoming a factor in the Jewish community in a social and cultural way.

On Dec. 10th, the lodge gave an entertainment and ball which was attended by more than 200 members and their friends. This was the first Jewish affair that was ever held in the city and was considered a great success by all who attended the same.

The lodge is arranging also for a further entertainment around Purim, as these affairs are very much desired by the co-religionists, and create good feeling among the members.

Under the auspices of the lodge, study groups are being founded under the supervision of the manager of the lodge, Bro. Rabbi M. Teller.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

FLINT, MICH.

Although the community of Flint had a splendid B'nai B'rith day on Sunday, Jan. 7, they were prepared two weeks later for another and most impressive celebration. Despite the stormy weather, a most enthusiastic lodge meeting was held during the afternoon. Nine men were initiated as members and Bro. Albert F. Mecklenburger delivered a most telling address. Speaking as a Jew, as well as a Ben B'rith, he urged the people to organize such institutions as a well organized Jewish community should possess. There are enough Jewish families in Flint to have a synagogue holding regular services. It will be the duty of the B'nai B'rith Lodge to encourage the organization of a congregation to work for the founding of a well equipped religious school and to emphasize the need for a philanthropic society. Encouraging these lines of activity, the B'nai B'rith will be doing splendid pioneer work in Flint.

At the evening meeting the largest outpouring of Jewish people which ever took place in Flint, was witnessed. President Benjamin F. Wiener called the meeting to order and introduced Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, from Chicago, who was called upon to install the elected officers for the ensuing term. With appropriate words Doctor Coffee in turn inducted into office Benjamin F. Wiener as president, William Hauser as vice-president, Samuel Jaffe as secretary and Phillip Catsman as treasurer. A splendid musical program was then carried out by the wives of members of the lodge. The concluding speaker of the evening was Doctor Coffee, whose subject was "Judaism and Social Service." In the course of his remarks he said that Flint, so he had been told, is among the fastest growing towns in America. Evidences abound on every side of a remarkable business growth. Jewish people are settling in Flint in increasing numbers. It is not sufficient that they make money. They must add spiritually and morally to the wealth of the city. Through the B'nai B'rith Lodge they should accomplish excellent results. In this city there will be many opportunities for assisting Jewish boys whose parents will not exercise supervision over them. The Big Brother Movement should be organized and everything done to strengthen its growth. The B'nai B'rith is taking a leading part in striving that equal rights be granted to all Jews in the war zone. We can best accomplish results by strengthening the membership of our Order and thus becoming a stronger and more efficient power for good. Every Jew in Flint should become a member of the Order for the great and fine work we are doing. Witness the splendid work of our Order to overcome religious prejudice, which unfortunately is not decreasing in our beloved country. During the past few days the bill restricting immigration passed both houses of Congress and unless there is a Presidential veto, the broad policy of encouraging immigration to enter our hospitable shores will cease. The best method whereby we can prevent this misfortune is to prove to America that Jewish immigrants are a rich asset to this country. Therefore, a holy duty rests upon us to lead righteous lives and become respected members of the community wherein we live. To the Jewish citizens of Flint the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith looks with deep interest and urges the lodge members to stand loyally together to assist one another and banish every form of strife and indifference. May you be among the leading progressive and public spirited citizens of this city. May your lives interpret the finest ideals of Judaism. Then Flint will rejoice and welcome more Jewish immigrants into this growing community.

LASKER LODGE, SAN DIEGO, CAL.

One of the best attended and most interesting meetings held by Lasker Lodge No. [illegible] of San Diego, Cal., was held on Monday evening, Jan. 15, 1917. A class of candidates was initiated and this was followed by the installation of officers by District Deputy Dr. H. L. [illegible]. When the installation ceremonies, which were interesting and impressive, were over, Bro. [illegible], the past president of the lodge presented the retiring president, I. T. Davidson, with a jewel as a token of the esteem in which he is held by the members of the lodge. Brother Davidson in accepting the token, made a very happy address. Refreshments were served and a social hour brought the evening to a close.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATED IN HOUSTON.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated in Houston on Jan. 21, when the three lodges invited their relatives and friends to a joint celebration at the Jewish Literary Hall.

The platform was beautifully decorated with palms, in the center of which gleamed the lighted Menorah overhung by a great American flag.

At eight o'clock the seating capacity of the hall was taxed and it was then that Mr. Sol Schoenman, second vice-president of District No. 7, called the meeting to order and introduced a pair of musical prodigies, Daniel Lubowski, age nine, and his sister, aged eleven, who rendered an overture of patriotic airs and responded to the vociferous applause with "The Serenade".

Mr. Schaenman then introduced the speaker of the evening, Mr. Ernest R. Bernstein, of Shreveport, president ot District No. 7.

"Our faith is born of inspiration, while that of others was founded either on commerce or conquest, and the command of Abraham has been the guiding star of our existence," said Mr. Bernstein, in outlining the principles of the Order and explaining the intense love the Jew has for his religion.

"Our Order has been much misunderstood", the speaker declared. "It is philanthropic", he said, as he went on to enumerate the institutions maintained by the Order, such as that of Hot Springs, Ark., where the afflicted of all races of creeds receive treatment; the institution at Denver for those suffering from tuberculosis, as well as others in different cities where the orphaned boys and girls of Jewish parentage are educated and sent out into the world a credit to their race.

"When a Jewish boy is arrested, charged with a crime and perhaps sent to jail, you will see headlines in many newspaper that it was a 'Jew'. How often when the boy arrested is of some other race or religious faith, do you read in the papers what his faith is?" said the speaker.

Mr. Bernstein then went on to say that the order provides homes for such boys who may be Jews. "To relieve this condition is one of our mottoes. We don't want the finger of scorn pointed at a man just because he is a Jew", he declared.

"Our order wants to inspire the Jew with noble precepts. There are some of our young men who have no idea of Jewish history or tradition or what our order stands for. It stands for culture and sociability."

He spoke in praise of the "back to the soil" movement, now gaining headway among the Jews. "Persecution drove the Jews into commercial lines", he said. "We were originally an agricultural people. There are now 40,000 Jewish farmers in the United States and the number is increasing. The farm loan bank, which is going to be a great help to farmers generally, had its inception in New York by Jews".

In conclusion Mr. Bernstein described the work the Order is undertaking among the Jews, of making them worthy in every way of the great traditions of that race. "Piety is the secret of immortality and this is the substance of our order and our religion", he declared.

Following the address a short reception was held, when many present greeted Mr. Bernstein.

EDWARD LASKER LODGE, TYLER, TEXAS.

Owing to local conditions, Edward Lasker Lodge, No. 247, celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Dec. 25th. A large and enthusiastic audience assembled and listened attentively to the forceful address of Bro. Rabbi W. Willner, of Houston Texas. President B. Wadel presided, stating the object of the meeting, and urged all of those not members—and they are but few—to join and aid in the noble work of the I. O. B. B.

A musical program rendered by the Misses Wadel, Bruck and Fleshner was well received. Rabbi M. Faber introduced the speaker in a few well chosen words. Dr. Willner spoke on "Enlightenment." The well chosen and timely subject was well handled and impressed very favorably those present. Refreshments were then served to those assembled.

KANSAS CITY LODGE, KANSAS CITY, MO.

On Monday evening, Jan. 29, Kansas City Lodge, No. 184, held a regular cultural meeting at the Temple Vestry Rooms. There was an unusually large attendance of members and President Alvin E. Block called the meeting to order and in a brief speech introduced Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, who spoke on "Judaism and Social Service." In opening his address, the Director paid a special tribute to Bro. Jacob Billikopf, whose labors had done so much toward starting this new B'nai B'rith activity. He called upon the brethren of Kansas City to undertake in their own community the very ideals for which the Department stands. Judaism has always emphasized Social Service. Ours is not a religion of dogma which lays the greatest stress on belief. The Bible is constantly emphasizing the thought of deeds and action in life and our Talmudic writings further emphasize this viewpoint. Our war is along the line sof peace. We fight, not with a bayonet and gun to kill our neighbor, but through the means of social service to uplift and strengthen our weaker brethren. The biblical reading for this week tells of the departure of the children of Israel from Egypt. This was the first step in the age-long war which will only cease when poverty will be abolished and "every man will dwell under his own vine and fig tree." In the determined effort to assist in this uplift crusade, the B'nai B'rith offers its splendid membership. Our first undertaking will be through the Big Brother Movement, and this aims to save Jewish lads and keep them morally pure and true to Judaism. The work has been going on now for slightly more than a year and excellent results prove the wisdom of entering this field of Social Service. Kansas City should appoint at once a strong Social Service Committee, look after the news boys of this city, most of whom are Jewish lads, investigate each case of truancy on the part of a Jewish child and appoint a Big Brother where the parents are ill or unable to supervise the wants of their children. In the next place, we would stress the care of released prisoners. Within an hour of this city are two National prisons and the few Jews who are there, should, when released, understand that the hand of a brethren faith is ready to give him another start. Kansas City is the key, in railroad terms, to the large southwestern part of America. This lodge should encourage such movements as aim to take Jews out of the crowded sections of the large cities and transfer them to the farms. In the past, Kansas City has been an aggressive force in our Order. With the new work we are undertaking, we look for increased effort in this splendid community.

This address was followed by a violin solo rendered by Mr. Reuben Josephson, accompanied on the piano by Mr. Archie Josephson. Bros. Jacob Lorie and A. C. Wurmser spoke on the work of our Order and urged the members to remember the war sufferers. In order to strengthen the Social Service work in Kansas City, a special meeting was held on Monday afternoon. A very large attendance of all the men were invited to undertake this work. Doctor Coffee outlined the general plans and steps were at once taken to provide volunteer workers for looking after the Jewish boys of this city. As Chairman of this Committee, Mr. Jack C. Reefer was appointed.

REBECCA LODGE, ALEXANDRIA, LA.

On Sunday, Jan. 7, Rebecca Lodge, No. 240, I.O.B.B. held its annual B'nai B'rith Day celebration. The guest of the occasion was Bro. E. R. Bernstein, president of D. G. L. No. 7. The day's activities consisted of the following:

At 2:30 p.m.—The annual meeting of the lodge, initiation of candidates and election of officers.

At 3:30 p.m.—Installation of officers, brief talks by Pres. Bernstein and others, followed by a social hour and refreshments.

At 8:00 p.m.—Formal program, consisting of the following:

Organ Prelude—Mrs. J. G. Thompson.
Vocal Solo—Mrs. Ben Weil.
Introductory Remarks—Bro. L. J. Rothstein.
Address—Bro. E. R. Bernstein.
Vocal Solo—Mrs. W. B. Nachman.

At 9:00 p.m.—Banquet at Hotel Bentley, complimentary to Pres. Bernstein.

BETH HORON LODGE, KANSAS CITY, KAN.

Sunday afternoon, Jan. 28, the annual celebration of B'nai B'rith Day was held by Beth Horon Lodge, No. 599. The occasion was honored by the presence of Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, of Chicago, National Director of the Social Service Department; Rabbi H. H. Mayer, of Kansas City, and Mr. Alvin E. Block, president of Kansas City Lodge, No. 184. The meeting, which was open to the Jewish community of the city, was opened by President Julius J. Levin. Doctor Coffee was introduced and chose as his theme "Jewish Ideals." In America we have a wonderful opportunity to reciprocate the great blessings of liberty and freedom which our beloved land grants us. The best way in which we can return our appreciation is to live high-minded, noble lives and thus enrich our country. According to biblical law, we may not charge interest in business. Since it is practically impossible for a merchant to obey this mandate, the Jew joins the Hebrew Free Loan Society. Throughout America last year, hundreds and thousands of dollars were loaned to worthy poor people, thus lifting them from the life of poverty to become self-supporting and independent. Our beloved Order is doing all within its power to assist worthy Israelites. This is the function of the Big Brother work which plans not only to save boys in the Juvenile Court, but rather to prevent Jewish lads from leaving the straight path of duty. We are further interested in enlarging this idea of the Big Brother Movement by providing a friend to every Jew who, on his release from prison, desires to lead an upright and clean life.

Dr. Mayer conducted Memorial Services and referred very feelingly to the three brethren who had departed this life during the past year. He mentioned by name, Bros. A. J. Holzmark, S. Bielsker and M. Drews. At the conclusion of the meeting, a Social Service Committee was at once appointed and the men promised to undertake the work at once. The Committee consists of Harry Levin, chairman, Harry Broud and Julius J. Levin. Addresses were also delivered by President Alvin E. Block, of Kansas City, Mo., and S. Katzenberg, former president.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

An earnest appeal for concerted effort in continuing and expanding social service activities in District No. 4 of the B'nai B'rith, embracing the Western slope, will be one of the predominant features of the annual message to the District Grand Lodge of Grand President Henry Newburgh.

Social service work was authorized at the last convention of the grand lodge and Harry K. Wolff, past grand president, was appointed as social service director of the District, with Dr. Alvin E. Cerf in charge of the work in California.

Splendid results have been achieved throughout the District and the continuation of this work, with its expansion along divers lines, is to be recommended by the grand president before he retires from office.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

At the January meeting of Jericho Lodge, No. 44, A. L. Solomon, past president of the District, installed the officers of the lodge. The gathering at that meeting which was unusually large augurs well for the success of the lodge during the ensuing year, and the members feel that this will be a banner year for Jericho Lodge.

One of the pleasing features of the meeting was the presentation of a card by Dr. J. Leonard Levy for affiliation with the lodge. The Doctor has been a member of the Order in California for many years and Jericho Lodge is proud to have him affiliated with the lodge.

On Sunday, Feb. 13, Bro. B. M. Goldsmith, superintendent of the Gusky Hebrew Orphanage, will address the members on the subject, "Our Home."

What Our Lodges Are Doing

FREDA LARGMAN BENEFICIAL SOCIETY.

At the request of Mr. A. Weil, of Philadelphia, we publish herewith a short sketch of the above named society:

The Freda Largman Beneficial Society was organized in February, 1913, with a membership of twenty-six. The motive which prompted its organiaztion was the desire of the sons of Freda Largman to perpetuate her name through work which would be commensurate with her ideals in life.

The organization was created for the purpose of aiding and assisting its members by the payment of sick and death benefits, and of fostering and furthering education and benevolence.

On March 7, 1916, the Society was granted a charter for these purposes by Common Pleas Court No. 2 of Philadelphia County.

It has only partly carried out its purposes because of the fact that during the four years of its existence it has never paid one cent in sick or death benefits. This failure was not due to the fact that its members all remained well during its existence, but because they are a set of men whose position in life does not require assistance of this nature. During the past year this condition became so manifest that the members realized that they were existing for the wrong purpose, and a movement was started with the idea in view of ascertaining whether it was possible for the organization to become a lodge enrolled under the banner of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, because its members felt that the work which the I. O. B. B. was accomplishing would be a fitting purpose for the motive which prompted this organization.

The Society has fostered intelligence and benevolence through the medium of lectures, debates and discussion upon topics affecting the political, social and economic welfare of the community at large. It has contributed also to various local charities during its existence.

It now has a total of sixty-five good standing members.

The Society has made formal application for a charter for a lodge to be instituted in Philadelphia to be composed of present existing members of the Society. The charter has been granted by District Grand Lodge, No. 3, and the institution of the new lodge will soon take place.

SAGINAW, MICH.

On Sunday, Jan. 21, Saginaw Lodge No. 636, held two meetings in honor of distinguished guests and earnest workers from Chicago. That afternoon a regular meeting of the lodge was held, at which Bro. Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, delivered a stimulating address to the assembled members on "The Next Step in B'nai B'rith Work." During the past years our Order has done splendid work along the lines of caring for the orphan, healing the sick and housing the aged among us. The additional work of our Order is to work along preventive lines. Unfortunately, the number of Jewish boys who come before the Juvenile Court is increasing. Our aim is to look after these lads when in trouble and also through the Big Brother Movement, to lead Jewish boys, through friendly guidance, in such a way that only the smallest number will become delinquent. Our Order is not a charitable organization in the sense of alms-giving and rendering temporary help. We rather aim, through volunteer workers, to assist our people toward economic independence and right living Too frequently many of the smaller towns boast that they have no poor people. Our invariable. answer is that they should have poor people. If there are opportunities for earnest Jewish men in Saginaw the local people should encourage newcomers to settle there.

That evening Bro. Albert F. Mecklenburger, member of the General Committee of District No. 6, delivered a most beneficial address before a very well attended open meeting. This talk was a powerful plea for the members of Sagi new to get in close touch with the current of Jewish events. History is rapidly being written for our people. The B'nai B'rith is very active in doing everything within its power to fight the growing wave of prejudice in America and to work for equal rights to Jews in all European lands. These wonderful opportunities urge every Jew to do his utmost. Saginaw can best help by building up a strong, earnest lodge which will always give heed to Israel's call.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND.

Theo. Herzl Lodge, No. 314, held a well attended meeting on Tuesday evening, Jan. 23, 1917, at which time various standing committees were appointed to serve for the ensuing year.

The Daughters of the Covenant Auxiliary to the Portland Lodge held a regular meeting on Jan. 23, 1917. The following standing committees were appointed: Social, literary and musical, Big Sisters, membership, visiting of sick, and finance.

On Sunday, Jan. 7, 1917, the B'nai B'rith Bowling Team defeated the Social Turn Verein Team by winning three straight games. The team averaged 790 points. On Sunday, Jan. 14, in a return match, the B'nai B'rith Team again won three straight games, averaging 800.

On Jan. 10, the first B'nai B'rith Basket Ball Team defeated the Jefferson High School Team, while the second B'nai B'rith Team defeated the Commercial High.

The B'nai B'rith Basket Ball Team gave a most successful dance on Thursday evening, Jan. 11. More than 200 couples attended.

A joint social session of Theo. Herzl Lodge, No. 314, and Oregon Auxiliary Daughters of the Covenant, was held on Tuesday, Jan. 16, 1917. Card prizes and refreshments were features of the evening. This was the first of a series of socials for the members.

The first meeting of Theo. Herzl Lodge, No. 314, with the new officers in charge, was held on Tuesday evening, Jan. 9, 1917. The meeting proved most interesting and a large attendance greeted the new officers. Various innovations were introduced which aroused discussion. The lodge made a handsome contribution toward the "Penny Sick Fund" of the Daughters of the Covenant. Much enthusiasm was aroused by the announcement that a doubling in the membership of the lodge is one of the goals of the present administration.

A record-breaking attendance, the initiation of a class of new members and the presentation of a gift to the retiring president, Mr. M. Wax, were features of a delightful meeting of Oregon Auxiliary, No. 2, Daughters of the Covenant, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 9, 1917. Short talks were made by Mr. David N. Mosessohn, first vice-president of the Grand Lodge, and Dr. A. Tilzer, ladies' deputy.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATION, BY DEBORAH LODGE, GREENVILLE, MISS.

An excellent program arranged by Deborah Lodge, No. 161, for the celebration of B'nai B'rith Day, was brilliantly presented at the Temple on Sunday evening, Jan. 21, 1917.

In spite of the inclement weather a large audience assembled and all enjoyed splendid music and eloquent addresses. The invocation by Rabbi Merfeld was impressive, the introductory remarks by President Schlessinger were bright and well delivered and the addresses of the evening by Mr. Peres were eloquent, interesting and instructive. The program was as follows:

Organ Voluntary, Miss Stella Strauss.
Vocal Solo, selected, Mr. R. H. O'Neill.
Invocation, Rabbi H. A. Merfeld.
Introductory Remarks, President M. P. Schlessinger.
Address, Hon. Israel H. Peres, of Memphis Lodge No. 35.
Vocal Solo, "God Be Merciful" (Bartlett), Mrs. J. M. Robertshaw.
Benediction.

During the past year the lodge has increased its membership from 56 to 64 and the new year begins under very favorable auspices.

VANCOUVER, B. C.

Samuel Lodge, No. 668, and its Ladies' Auxiliary, of Vancouver, B. C., held their joint installation of officers on Saturday evening, Jan. 6, 1917, before a large gathering. Mr. Max Grosman acted as installing officer and delivered an eloquent address, at the conclusion of which he presented the retiring president, Arthur H. Fleischman, with a past president's jewel. Following the installation ceremonies a number of musical numbers were rendered. At the close of the ceremonies dancing was enjoyed and a social time was spent. Refreshments were served in the evening. The affair proved a decided success.

EZEKIEL LODGE, NEWARK, N. J.

A gala meeting of Ezekiel Lodge, No. 90, I. O. B. B., was held on the evening of Jan. 24, 1917, for the purpose of paying out to the Endowment members their checks for their portion of the District Endowment Fund which was dissolved and discontinued. Each surviving member of the Fund received a check of about $400, and also an additional check for $135 from Ezekiel Lodge Endowment Fund. Owing to the illness of Grand Treasurer M. S. Meyerhoff, who was prevented from presenting these checks, Grand President Frederick Jay did the honor.

A large gathering of the Old Guard was present and reminiscences of the past were indulged in. Past Grand President B. S. Pollock installed the newly elected officers and also addressed the lodge. Final arrangements are now completed for the celebrating of the Golden Jubilee of the lodge, which will be held on Sunday evening, Feb. 25, 1917, at the Progress Club, and will be in the form of a banquet. Prominent speakers will deliver addresses and it is intended to make this event one of the great epochs of the lodge.

In conjunction with the banquet, Bro. Rabbi Chas. Hoffman has set aside Friday evening, Feb. 23, 1917, for a special service for B'nai B'rith and Ezekiel Lodge.

President, Mrs. L. C. Schwartz.
Vice-President, Mrs. Morris Herbst.
Treasurer, Mrs. Philip Schotland.
Financial Sec'y, Mrs. Louis Barnett.
Recording Sec'y, Mrs. Bernard Lewis.

MAGIC CITY LODGE, NO. 725, BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

The regular monthly meeting of Magic City Lodge, held on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 4, was rather brief, but very interesting. As usual, the members displayed enthusiasm and eagerness to assist in the activities of B'nai B'rithism.

In the evening of the same day, Magic City Lodge, No. 725, and Birmingham Lodge, No. 368, jointly celebrated B'nai B'rith Day at the beautiful auditorium of Temple Emanu-El. While Bro. A. Leo Oberdorfer made a few brief remarks about the fundamental principles of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, especially in relation to religious toleration, the principal speaker of the occasion was Bro. Charles N. Feidelson, Judge of Juvenile Court, of Savannah, Ga.

Brother Feidelson's theme was "Our Spiritual Famine", and he treated same with great care, deep study and sincere feeling towards the everlasting progress of his Jewish people. The speaker emphasized the fact that, owing to our economies and intellectual emancipation, the Jewish spiritual interests within the hearts of our Jewish youth does not find the necessary nourishment for a successful perpetuation of Judaism. He suggested several remedies, the most important of which are a better understanding of our Jewish faith and a deeper knowledge of our Jewish history.

Bro. Isadore Shapiro was chairman of the meeting. Miss Jean Adler and Miss Rose Fabian rendered organ and violin selection respectively.

John Hay Lodge, No. 634, celebrated the eighth annual B'nai B'rith Day on Sunday, Jan. 14. The event was marked by a delegation from Dakota Lodge from Grand Forks being present.

In the afternoon a well attended meeting was held in the lodge rooms, during which a class of candidates was initiated into the Order. The annual reports of the lodge and various committees were read, and short talks by a number of the brethren under the Good and Welfare of the Order closed the meeting.

In the evening the lodge rooms were opened to the members and their friends to witness the annual installation of officers. Brother Hugo Stern, past president of the lodge installed the officers, and Bro. George Papermaster, president of Dakota Lodge, Grand Forks, delivered an address. His subject was "The Americanization of the Immigrant," and he called attention to the problems of immigration and the good work the B'nai B'rith is doing to assist the stranger of our faith to adapt himself to his new surroundings.

SHOLEM LODGE, LEAVENWORTH, KAN.

On Tuesday, Jan. 30, Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee paid a visit to our community and was met by a committee consisting of Brothers Ettenson, Rosenfield, Abeles and Goldstein. Doctor Coffee was at once driven out to the United States Disciplinary Barracks, the largest institution of its kind in the country, where soldiers are sent for minor infringements of discipline. The officers very kindly called the few Jewish boys into the Chapel and they were informed as to the new work of our Order. Two of these boys are to be released within the next month and arrangements will be made for looking after their welfare. Brother Abeles visits them every second Sabbath afternoon and is their warm and consistent friend. Directly thereafter, the committee drove over to the Federal Penitentiary, which is also the largest of its kind in our land. The Jewish men were brought into the Warden's office directly after luncheon and the committee held a private talk with each man. Brother Abeles visits this institution every second Sabbath and is friendly with all the men. Our Order refuses to interfere in the punishment of a man because he is of our faith, but when he has completed his term, we are prepared to assist him toward right living. The men were greatly heartened by this visit from outside friends and Chaplain Soldan assured his visitors that this trip had by no means been in vain. Later in the day Doctor Coffee was introduced to a number of Leavenworth B'nai B'rith Lodge members.

WORCESTER LODGE, WORCESTER, MASS.

On Jan. 9, 1917, officers for the ensuing term were installed by Worcester Lodge No. 600, of Worcester, Mass. Judge A. K. Cohen, President of the District Grand Lodge, acted as installing officer.

Six new members were initiated by the junior degree team. The exemplification of the ritual by the junior degree team was also in competition for prizes offered by District No. 1. The judges were Judge A. K. Cohen and Henry Lasker, member of the general committee of District No 1.

Retiring President Adolph Hirsch was given a gold watch fob and Albert Beeber, recording secretary, was given a fountain pen. Both of these officers have been very diligent in their duties and it was in recognition of their activities that the lodge made these gifts. The term just passed shows an increase of 64 in the membership of the lodge, making a total membership on Jan. 1, 1917, of 168.

This meeting was well attended, about 100 of the members being present. After the installation, addresses were delivered by Judge A. K. Cohen, Bro. Henry Lasker and Bro. A. M. Hillman, recently elected to membership in the general committee.

Bro. Jacob Asher, recently appointed by Governor McCall to a justiceship of the Central District Court of Worcester, also spoke after receiving the congratulations of the lodge.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

On Sunday, Jan. 14, Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, occupied the pulpit of Dr. J. Leonard Levy and remained an additional day to discuss B'nai B'rith activities with the Social Service Committee. A splendid luncheon gathering had been arranged, at which practically every member of the Social Service Committee was in attendance, with Bro. Leonard S. Levin, chairman in charge. Bro. Charles I. Cooper, secretary of the Pittsburgh Committee, told of the manner in which the Big Brother Movement is spreading. Doctor Coffee laid great stress on the need for educating Jewish immigrants in Pittsburgh along the lines of Americanization. While Pittsburgh has a good night-school system, a campaign should be conducted to encourage as many Jewish men and women as possible to attend night school, and also to take out citizenship papers. The local committee is doing splendid work and received warm praise from the speaker. That night, Ibn Gabirol, No. 114, had its regular monthly meeting, and Doctor Coffee, who is a member of this lodge, attended the session. He addressed his friends along very practical lines, giving concrete instances of the constructive work which was being accomplished in cities throughout the land. The beneficial work our Order is doing with released prisoners was also touched upon in the course of the address.

Brother Henry Meyers, one of the most active Governors of the Home, has been indisposed lately. All who knew the good work of Brother Meyers are sincerely praying for his speedy recovery. Bro. Meyers will be 75 years old April 3, 1917.

THE B'NAI B'RITH.

The Independent Order B'nai B'rith takes its place in the Congress movement as one of the democratic forces. The Order is to be congratulated upon its decision. For many years the B'nai B'rith has maintained a democratic organization, strongly disciplined, organized for philanthropic purposes, but wavering as to the larger interests of the Jewish people. It maintained its international character, and rested upon its laurels, leaving to other forces with more energy to acquire a predominating influence in Jewish life. With the acquisition of new elements, the B'nai B'rith has with difficulty held to a neutral attitude on many of the pressing questions of the day. One thing was clear. If it wished to hold its own, and prevent its own submergence as an important deciding factor, it would have to abandon its neutrality. At the Hotel Savoy conference, Mr. Kraus made his decision. He cast the lot of the B'nai B'rith with the democratic, nationalistic elements. He thus aided materially in the overthrow of the erstwhile Eastern leaders, and reestablished his own organization in the good opinion and esteem of many of its friends.—The Maccabean.

JEWISH LEADERS

A Series of Historical Portraits

By RABBI SAMUEL S. COHON, Chicago

Copyrighted, February, 1917, by Samuel S. Cohon

6. EZEKIEL, THE LEADER, AS PRIEST-PROPHET.

By the side of the kings and prophets of ancient Israel, the priests of the sanctuary asserted the power of leadership. The origin of the established priesthood lies in deep obscurity. Late Biblical tradition regards Aaron as the father of this institution; but this title should rather be reserved to Moses, the Founder of Israel, to whom the priesthood as well as prophecy probably owes its origin. One passage in the Book of Exodus (XXXIII:7-11), speaks of him rather than of Aaron as the priest of the Tent of Meeting, whither the people turned to consult the will of God. Tradition claims that Moses sprang from the tribe of Levi. A careful study leads one to suspect the reverse; that Levi first formed itself about the person of Moses. "The pick of those faithful to Yahweh," from all tribes, who hastened, at a critical moment, to his aid, lending their arm even against their own kinsmen in defense of the pure religion (Exodus XXXII:26-28), remained from that time on united, and formed a new tribe, "Levi," (in all likelihood, derived from the Hebrew root Lawa—"to attach oneself to another"), which was subsequently reckoned together with all the other tribes among the sons of Jacob. As the "body guard" of Moses, forming, as it were, his wider family, the Levites could rightly claim to be initiated in the mysteries of Yahweh worship. Therefore, they failed—in company with the tribe of Simeon—to gain a foothold in Canaan, and were almost annihilated in the process (Genesis XXXIV and XLIX:5-7), their remnants scattered all over the land where their services as priests were at a premium. While at first any man might have discharged the priestly duties, during the period of the Monarchy the Levites gained the exclusive right to the Yahweh priesthood, so that every priest had to be a Levite. (See K. Budde, Religion of Israel to the Exile, pages 79-87.)

Just as prophecy in Israel rose to new power in conjunction with the political state, so was the priesthood raised to new prominence with the formation of the Monarchy. Zadok, appointed as head minister by Solomon, became the founder of a long line of priests that held a dominant place in the life of the Jewish people from the construction of the First Temple to the destruction of the Second Temple, for a period of more than a thousand years—outliving kingship and prophecy. With the elevation of the house of Zadok, the priestly prerogative was not taken away from the other Levitical families. In the Blessing of Moses which pictures the religious and social conditions of Israel immediately after the completion of the Temple, no distinction is made between Levites and priests. The whole tribe of Levi without exception is entrusted with the maintenance of the service of the altar, and with the care of the Urim and Thumin or the sacred oracle, by the direction of which the will of God was divined for man. "They (the whole tribe), show Jacob Thy judgments, and Israel Thy instruction—"direction" or "law"—they set incense in Thy nostril, and whole offerings upon Thine altar." (Deuteronomy XXXIII:10. See Driver's Commentary to the Book of Deuteronomy). Nevertheless, it was but natural that the Zadokites, ministering at the royal sanctuary at Jerusalem, should have gained greater prestige than those Levites that were connected with the village shrines. Their importance further grew with the promulgation of the Deuteronomic Law (of which they may have been partly the authors), by King Josiah in the year 621 B. C. E., which suppressed all the outlying places of worship, and concentrated all the religious life of the nation in the Temple of Jerusalem. The Book of Deuteronomy expressly secured to both classes of Levites the right of exercising priestly functions (Deuteronomy XVIII:6-8). It was left to Ezekiel, himself of the House of Zadok, by virtue of authority as prophet, to limit the priestly prerogative to the sons of Zadok, and to turn the other Levites into subordinate officials of the Temple. Thus the established Levitical priesthood, began with Moses, found its culmination in the teaching of Ezekiel.

As the authoritative interpreters and even framers of the Law, and as ministers and guardians of the traditional worship, the priests often came into conflict with the prophets who represented the more progressive force in the religion of Israel, whose gaze was ever directed forward and upward, and who ever championed the new revelation of God. Finding themselves impeded by the conservative power of the priests, the prophets often condemned them for their spiritual blindness, and for their overemphasis of ceremonialism, at the expense of morality and the religion of the heart. The prophets were the radicals and revolutionaries of their day,—not reckless iconoclasts who (in Nordau's figure), are to civilization what innundations or cyclones would be as street sweepers, clearing the ground without any conscious aim but blindly destroying. They were "clear-minded innovators, true revolutionaries, who are reformers, leading suffering and stagnating humanity from time to time by toilsome paths, into a new Canaan" If they tore down old foundations it was only to build up newer and stronger ones. Hence their conflicts with the priests were, at times, put aside; and, as in the case of the composition of the Book of Deuteronomy, the two joined forces. The priestly and prophetic tendencies were united in Moses and in Samuel. And they were most harmoniously blended in the first great leader of the period of the Exile, who appears in the double role, as priest-prophet—Ezekiel of Babylon.

As a prophet he championed God's universal dominion on earth, and His reign of righteousness. With his prophetic predecessors, he insisted that what religion demands of man is that he do justice, love kindness, and walk humbly before God. And as a loyal priest, he understood the full value of ritual. A pure ritual is as essential to religion as sounds are to music, as words to thought, as pictures to painting. The ritual becomes dangerous when the Spirit of God no longer permeates the worshippers; and it thus turns into a lifeless mass of ceremonies. What is then needed is not the total abrogation but the reformation of the ritual and, above all, the reformation of the hearts of the worshippers. Thus combining the ideals of the great preachers of righteousness with the traditions of the ministers of the Temple, Ezekiel became one of the most important constructive leaders of the religion of Israel, perhaps second only to Moses.

As a member of the leading priestly family of Zadok, Ezekiel, when still a young man, was deported from Palestine by Babylonia, by King Nebuchadnezzar, together with the prominent members of the priesthood, aristocracy and royalty, in the year 597, eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem (586 B. C. E.). The body of "patrician" captives was taken to Tel-Abib, a spot within easy communication with most of the important cities of the land, and not far south of the capital, Babylon. There, they were permitted to carry on their trades, to own land, and even to maintain some form of self-government. Ezekiel lived with his wife among the captives, preaching the message of contrition, repentance and salvation for over twenty years (592-570 B. C. E.). The sorrows, hopes and dreams of his people during that period of national probation, were entwined about his personality.

His prophetic activity is reflected in his book which stands third in the group of Major Prophets. As no other prophetic book in the Bible, that of Ezekiel is free from amplifications and additions. Throughout, it forms an "articulated whole," distinguished in all its parts, by "a strongly individualized style," and set in a framework of supernatural visions. With the exception of but few passages, the book is written in rhetorical prose. (Gray, Critical Introduction to the Old Testament, chapter XXII). Though in places his style rises to a high pitch of eloquence and even poetry, it is, as Professor Moore remarks, "generally pedestrian and sometimes clumsy." His sentiments are poetic, but they are often marred by copious repetitions and by their profuse and even verbose forms of expression. If his book lacks the vigor and terseness of Isaiah's and the grace and lyricism of Jeremiah's, as a whole it exhibits decided marks of superior artistry of arrangement and conception, and gives him a commanding place among the great authors of the world. He was an accomplished scholar, thoroughly acquainted wtih the history, laws, wisdom and literature of his people, and with the religious and political ideas of the surrounding nations. As a painter of verbal pictures, he has had few rivals in the domain of letters. Attempts to present his symbolism and his imagery on the canvas, taxed the minds of Raphael, Albrecht and Durer. Herder spoke of him as "the Aeschylus and the Shakespeare of the Hebrews"; Schiller wished to study Hebrew in order to read Ezekiel's writings in the original; and Victor Hugo exhausted his vocabulary in praising this man of inexhaustible religious depth and literary skill.

Like the other prophets, Ezekiel rebuked, threatened and warned his people; and he also taught and comforted them. He indulged in symbolic action or dramatic presentation of his message, more than any other prophet. We see him seated lowly, despondent and grief-stricken over the guilt of Judah; then we behold him standing firmly on his feet, justifying to the elders of the people the ways of God and man. Here he stands as a watchman on a high tower, sounding the alarm; and there he moves in the valley with his eyes uplifted, dreaming the dream of Israel's regeneration. It was due in no small degree to his sharp perception of the needs and problems of his day that the history of the Jews did not come to an end with the collapse of the Jewish state.

His consecration to the prophetic mission, which took place five years after his arrival in Babylon, Ezekiel describes in a vision which bears a strong resemblance to Isaiah's. The Rabbis noted the striking contrast of Ezekiel's copiousness and Isaiah's terseness. They said that while the prophet of Jerusalem speaks of God in the manner in which a person living at the capital speaks of the king's train, Ezekiel describes God's appearance very much as a villager talks about his first sight of the king. In veiled pictures—in which the Phoenician symbolism of the Temple in Jerusalem mingles with Babylonian religious art, Ezekiel presents his vision of God. As he stood by the river Chebar in Tel-Abib, he beheld a storm cloud bursting forth from the way of Jerusalem. Out of the midst of the cloud interfused with fire and surrounded by brightness, gleamed something like shining metal. Looking more intently into this splendor, he distinguished four creatures of human form, facing in four directions, each making one side of the fiery cherub-chariot. Each had four faces, four wings and the arms of a man. Their legs were straight, and the soles of their feet were like the soles of a calf's feet. Every one had the face of a man in the front, that of a lion on the right, of a bull on the left, and of an eagle behind. On each creature, two wings covered the body; and two, extending sidewise, touched those on either side. Beside and between them, at each corner of this living chariot, were two wheels set at right angles, within one another. The frames of the wheels are full of eyes, and the wheels turned not as they went. Over the chariot and above the heads of the four creatures rested a sapphire-like firmament whereon stood a throne, and on the throne was a form of a man, surrounded by a dazzling brightness. "It was the appearance of the likeness of God's glory", departing from the Temple of Jerusalem to dwell with the exiles of Babylonia. (C. H. Toy, The Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, notes to Chapter 1.) The prophet fell on his face and heard the Divine Voice commanding him to rise and go to the rebellious people. A book of lamentation, mourning, and woe, was placed in his mouth, and God commanded him: "Eat this book and go and speak to the House of Israel." Like Jeremiah, he found even the threatening words of God as sweet as honey. Then the spirit of God lifted him up and carried him off to his people; and there was a great noise of the rustling of the wings of the four creatures and of the revolving wheels beside them. He was deeply stirred, for "the hand of God", he says, "was strong upon him". Henceforth, he regarded himself as a watchman of the House of Israel, whose duty it was to warn the wicked and to encourage the righteous. All through his prophetic career, he was guided by this and similar visions. In his free and "winged fancy", he saw "the likeness of a man, from the loins downward like fire, and from the loins upward like the gleam of shining metal", which seized him by the locks of his hair and carried him through the air to Jerusalem into the presence of the Divine glory. (Ezekiel VIII:2-4.) Professor J. Morgenstern observes that "the prophet refused to conceive the Kebbod Yahweh (Divine Glory) as descending to such mechanical, and in itself unimportant work, as bringing the prophet from Babylon to Jerusalem; and so this task was delegated to the mediator of Mal'ak (messenger or angel) of the Kebbod Yahweh" (Biblical Theophamies, Chapter XII). The same figure appeared in Ezekiel's imagination as a man clad in linen and with an ink-horn on his hip, leading six other supernatural beings through Jerusalem on their mission of destroying the faithless men and women (Ezekiel IX). These pictorial illustrations of the supernatural, probably used in the first place as purely literary devices, have caused endless confusion in the religious thought of Jew and Christian.

The prophets before Ezekiel who were active during the existence of the Jewish state, addressed themselves to the whole nation, to its princes and kings. This produced the erroneous impression that the prophets were essentially statesmen. With Ezekiel there is no room for misunderstanding. He confronted not a national government, but a religious congregation. Though he spoke of the nation's destiny, he addressed himself primarily to the individual. He spoke of himself as a pastor of the flock, and regarded the care and cure of the individual soul as his chief concern. God himself appeared, in the eyes of Ezekiel, as the great Good Shepherd, and Israel the flock which He leads. Torn away from organized religious life, his followers made his house the meeting place for instruction and probably also for prayer. This was the small beginning of the great democratic institution of the Synagog, the institution which has preserved Jewish life to this day.

The burden of Ezekiel's preaching, during the first six years of his ministry, was contrition and repentance. His fellow captives were urged by certain prophets to believe in the indestructability of Jerusalem and in their speedy return from captivity. Against this false optimism Jeremiah protested in his letter to the xiles (Jeremiah XXIX), counseling them to settle down into the life of Babylon

Ezekiel, too, consistently pointed out that the sinful city of Jerusalem will be destroyed. Its wickedness exceeds that of Sodom and Samaria, which God uprooted in His anger. It is a city of injustice and corruption. The very sanctuary of the living God is defiled with the images of idols which the elders of Israel as well as the common folk openly worship. (Ezekiel VIII.) This apostasy and lewdness of Israel was not of recent date. Israel always was rebellious. Unlike Hosea and Jeremiah, Ezekiel cannot find a single period in the people's past when they were truly devoted to God. God found Israel in the desert in a helpless and degraded position, and in His mercy He cared for her and wedded her; but as a faithless spouse, the nation corrupted itself. But what can be expected from a people descended from a low idolatrous stock, whose father was an Amorite and whose mother a Hittite? (Ezekiel XVI.)

Ezekiel looked upon himself not only as the watchman of the House of Israel, but also as the defender of Israel's God. Those among the captives who were not conscious of any apostasy of their own inferred that they suffered either for the faithlessness of their fathers or for that of their neighbors. This appeared to them as highly unjust. "The fathers are sour grapes", they complained, "and the teeth of the children are set on edge". In opposition to this saying which was flung into his teeth, Ezekiel asserted the principle that every soul "sustains its own independent relation" to God. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die"! (Ezekiel XVIII.) Carried away by his zeal for the idea of personal responsibility, which Jeremiah had already advocated, Ezekiel apparently broke away from the old conception of the solidarity of the family, and passed over "to the opposite extreme of an individualism of the most atomistic type—atomistic not only from the point of view of social ethics and life, but even from the point of view of the individual itself. The fact of the essential unity and continuity of each life is ignored; life is considered from the point of view of actions, not character. The ties of heredity and environment which link a man to his fellowmen, and often involve the innocent with the guilty in temporal disaster, are not given due consideration" J. M. P. Smith, The Prophet and his Problem, p. 203-4.) Fortunately, Ezekiel contradicts himself. Though emphasizing the idea of individualism, "he never loosened his hold upon the thought of Yahweh as fundamentally in union with Israel's land", though His glory is present everywhere. (Ibid.) And he retained his belief in the unity of God and Israel. "When Israel, through its sinfulness, compelled Yahweh to leave His earthly dwelling-place and expel His people from its land, it disturbed a relation which for God's sake, as well as for Israel's, must ultimately be restored. The world exists for the glory of Yahweh, and the goal of history is not reached till, in Ezekiel's favorite words, it is known of Gentile as well as Jew . . . that 'I am Yahweh'" (C. G. Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures, p. 248.) This national mysticism enabled Ezekiel to guard his fellow captives against the danger of assimilation with their heathen neighbors of Babylonia, to refine their religious ideas, and to prepare them for the world-wide mission that awaited them.

A grave difficulty of a practical nature presented itself to the faithful ones among the captives. In a strange land away from altar and sanctuary, how shall God be worshipped? This difficulty was aggravated by the belief of the times that religion is inseparable from country and nationality. "A nation's country was the home and dwelling place of its national deity; to be torn away from one's native soil was equivalent to being torn away from Him; ;and thus was destroyed the strongest bond and the deepest source of nationality". (H. Cornill, Prophets of Israel p. 198-9.) Ezekiel, too, shared their belief that every country outside Palestine was unclean, but in his deeper conception of God he realized that even in a foreign land worship can be offered Him. While away from Jerusalem, sacrifices could not be brought upon the altar, other forms of divine service remained. There was the Sabbath, which could be observed even in the land of captivity no less than in their native land. This institution Ezekiel regarded as fundamental to Judaism. It is "a sign between God and Israel", he declared. "by which they shall know that it is God that sanctified them". On the other six days of the week, too Israel must feel itself a holy nation. Their dealings with their fellowmen must be just, their family life must be distinguished by purity and chastity. And they must, above all, keep away from the defilement of idolatrous practices. "I have sent them far off among the nations, and scattered them over the lands", says the prophet in God's name, "but I shall be their sanctuary a while (usually rendered: 'a little sanctuary') in the lands whither they are gone". God's "presence will be to them all that the Temple was". (C. H. Toy, Ezekiel, note to Ezekiel XI:16.) Should the hearts of the people be purged of all idolatry, God will take them back to their land. (Ezekiel XX.)

In this strain Ezekiel preached during the first part of his ministry, warning the people of the impending doom of Jerusalem, and calling them to whole-hearted repentance. At last the fatal day arrived. The land of Judah was devastated, Jerusalem destroyed, and the Temple of God turned into a heap of ruins. The final crash of their glory came like a paralyzing shock to the Jews. When the sad news reached the prophet his hard words disappeared. Tears overpowered him. His tones grew gentler. The cords of his heart rang with compassion for his sorrowing people. "My flock are ye", he announced in the name of the Divine Shepherd, "the flock that I tend; and I am your God, says the Lord". (XXXIV: 31.) God does not punish in order to crush the sinner, but to reform him that he may live. Thus Ezekiel took his nation to his heart; and his love which had earlier spoken through his chastisement, now showered upon them the tenderest comfort.

The tales of woe that the captives brought about the tragic fate that befell Judah and the cruelties of the neighboring nations, especially of Edom, aroused the prophet's indignation. In his oracles against the wicked nations he predicted their destruction: "The nations round about you shall bear their own shame! But ye, O mountains of Israel, shall shoot forth your branches and yield your fruit to my people Israel, for shortly shall they come . . . The cities shall be reinhabited, and the waste places built". (XXXVI:7ff.) God will restore Israel not because of the people's righteousness, but on account of His own good name, that through Israel His glory may be revealed to all the nations. God will then create in the people a new spirit that will have utter contempt for idolatry and impurity. "I will sprinkle pure water on you, and you shall be pure from all your impurities; from all your idols I will purify you; I will give you a new heart and put within you a new spirit. I will take the heart of stone out of your bosom and give you a heart of flesh; my own spirit I will put in you; I will cause you to follow my statutes and observe and perform my ordinances. Ye shall dwell in the land which I gave to your fathers; ye shall be my people and I shall be your God. . . . On that day men shall say: This land which was desolate is become a garden of Eden; and the waste and abandoned and ruined cities are become fortified and inhabited". (XXXVI:22-38.)

In the first six years of his preaching Ezekiel had to fight the people's overweaning self-confidence and pride; during the remainder of his career he was forced to dispell the clouds of despair from their hearts. Having seen so much sorrow, they could not believe that there was hope for them. To his downcast brethren, Ezekiel brought this vision of sublimest grandeur: He was carried away by the spirit of God—so he tells them—into a valley which was full of dry bones, and was asked: "Can these bones live"? Knowing the greatness of God's power, he answered hesitatingly: "O Lord God, Thou alone knowest". Then he was commanded to prophecy to the dry bones, in the name of God: "Behold, . . . I will put sinews on you, and clothe you with flesh, and lay skin on you, and put breath into you, and ye shall live, and shall understand that I am God". As the prophet spoke there was a rattling of the bones; they came together bone to bone; there were sinews on them; flesh covered them, and skin clothed them; but there was still no life in them. Again he was ordered to prophecy, saying: "From the four winds come, O spirit, and breathe into these dead bones that they may live"! And the spirit of God came into them and revived them, and they stood upon their feet. Even as these bones—exclaimed the prophet—so are the people of Israel. They say "our bones are dry, our hope is gone, we are ruined". But God will take them out of the land of their exile (their national grave), fill them with His spirit and place them in their own land. In the regenerated Israel there shall not be one struggling kingdom in the North, and another feeble monarchy in the South. Judah and Israel shall be reunited under one righteous king—another King David; and shall prosper through the grace and the presence of God.

Ezekiel had witnessed the corruption and had seen the abominations in Jerusalem and in the very Temple before the Exile. He had gone through the Inferno of degradation, and now, dreaming of a new order of things, he resolved to create a Paradise of sanctity and of Godliness for his people. In order to bring this dream into actuality, he devised a practical scheme for the political and religious reconstruction of the nation. His proposed constitution aims at the establishment of a complete kingdom of God, in all its details, wherein the rule of holiness, in its moral and ritual sense, is applied to every phase of national and personal life. In a vision, he is carried to the land of Israel and set on a high mountain where a heavenly being with "a flaxen plumb line and measuring rod in his hand" sketches for him the Temple of the future. And he beholds the return of the glory of God, in the cherub-chariot, to Zion, to re-inhabit the sanctuary. And a voice proclaims: "Son of man, this is the place of my throne; the place for the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever". The old Temple had been virtually the king's chapel. The palace had adjoined it, and the sepulchres of the kings had been in close proximity. These and other offensive features shall be removed from the new Temple. It shall be consecrated solely to God. Non-Jews shall not serve in it. And those Levites that had ministered in rural sanctuaries (which were declared illegitimate and closed by the Deuteronomic law) shall not serve as priests there. They shall perform only the menial tasks. Only the Levites of the House of Zadok, "who kept the charge of the true sanctuary when the Israelites went astray", shall be the priests of the new Temple. Ezekiel's ruling (on this as on many other matters) was embodied in the Priestly Code; and thus arose the distinction between the Levi'im and the Kohanim. And a tradition was created tracing this distinction to the very birth of the religion of Israel, and assigning the hereditary priesthood to the House of Aaron.

In Ezekiel's plan, the Temple forms the center of the nation. The territory around is assigned to the Levites and priests, that both their material well being and the proper care of the sanctuary may be secured. The lands to the east and west of the sacred territory are set aside for the ruling prince. The country to the north and to the south of the Temple is apportioned between all the tribes of Israel. The sanctuary shall form the central place not alone in the land, but in the life of the nation. Stated and regular sacrifices shall be offered there on the Sabbaths, New Moons and Festivals. These sacrifices shall be provided by the prince. Great prominence is given to the sin offering and to the atoning ritual, which is to take place twice yearly, at the beginning of the first and of the seventh months. "This", writes W. R. Smith, "is the first appearance outside of the Levitical Code, of anything corresponding to the great day of Atonement in the seventh month". It is therefore possible that from the simple service in Ezekiel grew the solemn ceremonial of Yom Kippur. (W. R. Smith, The Old Testament in the Jewish Church, p. 376-7; and C. H. Toy, Ezekiel, p. 199.)

The prince of the land, in Ezekiel's scheme, is to be the chief patrons of the Temple, and also the administrator of justice. He shall put away violence and oppression, promote equity and justice, and relieve the people from unlawful exactions of tribute. He shall also enforce the use of right weights and measures and of an equitable currency. (Ezekiel XLV.) While he shall rule the people, their true King shall be God Himself. As a nation governed by God, Israel shall be the representative of God in the eyes of the whole world. Thus the prophet who, at the beginning of his career, stressed the principle of individual responsibility to the extreme, "finds the highest expression of religion not in the isolated life of the individual, but in the group life of the community. His community is, of course, composed of individual members, all of whom sustain right relations to God; they live, however, not for individual ends, but for the furtherance of the purpose of the community, which is the revelation of God's glory to the world". (J. M. P. Smith, The Prophet and His Problem, p. 205-6.) The New Jerusalem of Ezekiel's vision, in which the spirit of sanctity pervades all hearts, rightly deserves the name which he gave it: "Yahweh Shammah—God is here"!

Ezekiel gave Judaism a new lease of life. Though like the rest of the prophets, he experienced the spiritual apathy of the people, and he even complained that the people gathered to hear him because they enjoyed his musical voice, his eloquence and his beautiful delivery, and turned a deaf ear to his instruction, yet his message took deep root in the heart of Israel. Though not realized in full, his hopes of the future yielded an abundant harvest. The external side of his Utopia took shape, in the restored Israel, in the form of the Theocratic state, which played so prominent a part in the history of the Jews, and later on in the life of the Christian Church. His visions of the restored splendor of Israel and of the revival of the dry bones, gave rise to fantastic creations and dreams which have soothed the hearts of the Jews in anguish, and given them strength to endure hardship and wait for the unfailing help of God. Thus Ezekiel takes his place among the dominant figures of Israel who, as a pillar of the Torah, as priest, and as prophet, has moulded our people into a kingdom of priests and a holy nation.

THE POLISH PERFIDY IN THE DEMAND FOR LIBERTY AND INDEPENDENCE.

By Dr. S. Emes in the "Echo de Russie."

As was to be expected, the Papal encyclical letter denouncing the persecutions of the Jews, has had no effect whatsoever and these sorrowful affairs continue with the same intense hatred and upon the identical false pretenses as before.

What is the most surprising is, that the "Temps," which up to the present has not printed one word of commiseration on behalf of the persecuted Jews of Russia and Poland, has now thrown open its columns to a disgraceful campaign against the unfortunate victims of those atrocities.

In a telegram which the "Temps" had sent to it, the Poles inform the Entente powers, that as between themselves and Germany they will prefer the former and these are the most important reasons advanced to justify that minor event: The Jews, they say, have opened two crimes with German complicity; they have opened many schools and, horrible to say, they teach in their own language; furthermore, they have built synagogs "alongside" of Catholic churches.

As to the schools, the case may be stated correctly, although it is in no wise in accordance with information we have received from Russia and which does all honor to the Jews, who despite this storm of suffering and all their misfortunes have not ceased to provide the means for the instruction of their children and one need be a Polish anti-Semite in order to find fault therewith. Besides, according to the same source of information, the Poles have themselves opened quite a number of schools "in their own language" since the German invasion of Poland.

As to the second crime of the Jews, which drives the Poles into the arms of the Entente powers, that charge of having built synagogs alongside of Catholic churches is equally ludicrous and false.

Anti-Semitism in Poland, as elsewhere, is based mainly upon economic grounds. It is the competition of the Jews in the industrial, commercial and other activities that has created a dire hatred both against the Poles and against the Jews; if Poland has gained a considerable development in all lines of trade, it is due to a great extent to the efficient activities of the Jews. But the competition which has penetrated the entire contemporaneous life and which has led Europe into the present bloody struggle, is a crime in the eyes of the Poles when that competition is caused by the Jews in Poland.

What is most ridiculous is that the Poles also are jealous of the competition caused by the erection of synagogs alongside of their churches, in the same way as the hawker at a country fair, having secured a good location, would hate to see a competitor installed in the vicinity.

Do these Poles fear that the prayers of the Jews, recited in Hebrew, the only language of God the Father of God the Son during Biblical times, might prove acceptable to the Deity before their own Latin prayers, so little understood by themselves, could be heard?

That question should be answered by the Polish political agents and by the "Temps".

As to those millions of Polish Jews, those "Poles of Mosaic faith" of 1863, those unfortunates accused of being Russian spies, who without any transition stage have since the declaration of the war been denounced as "pro-German" agents and spies, they will continue, as they did in the past, to remain steadfast adherents of the Polish democracy and to struggle for their own freedom as well as for the liberty of Poland.

RUSSIAN MINISTER ON JEWISH LAWYERS.

The new Minister of Justice, M. Dobrovolsky, has expressed himself openly in favor of a policy of tolerance towards the subject of nationalities. He has also criticised the present abnormal condition of barring Jewish lawyers from becoming Advocates. He describes this state of affairs as an injustice to the cause of justice.

THE PROBLEM OF AMERICAN JUDAISM

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

Under the above caption there has appeared in the February number of the "Atlantic Monthly" a paper by Ralph Philip Boas, associate professor of English at Whitman College, in the state of Washington. The paper, written in a simple style, will unquestionably cause resentment in Jewish circles, as may be judged by the temper of one rejoinder which has come to my notice. Our theologians and semi-theologians will be nettled at the daring of a layman to challenge positions regarded as established. For it is the quality of the lay mind to place itself out of range by the very manner in which it puts questions. Even the man untrained to theological thinking will perceive that there is a flaw somewhere in the arguments presented by Mr. Boas. But somehow it is difficult to lay one's hand on the sore spot. For the writer deals with facts, and facts are irrefutable.

The facts are, of course, as the professor sees them. His angle of view is not difficult to comprehend. Men who have undergone experiences similar to those which Mr. Boas has been through, who have resided for a long period in a Christian community and whose associations have been largely with cultured Christians, may perhaps recollect how the Jewish question was the topic of discussion with many a colleague, how it feels to be excluded from the "Christian" club or perhaps to be the only Jew admitted to membership, how the philosophers will din into your ears that Judaism is but an arrested development, sterile, of no moment in the spiritual development of mankind, and the founder of Christianity was the flower and fruition of Julaism, how the atheist physiologist will seek to convert you to a mechanistic conception of the universe and dispose of Houston Stewart Chamberlain as a trifler; how college presidents will tell you that anti-Semitism without and the Jewish organization within, make for social segregation, and that those Jewish families who are lukewarm in their adherence to Judaism, "Hellenists," as they call them, command the respect of the community at large. The Christian estimate of Judaism may go against one's grain, but when day in and day out it is thrust at you the result is that you come to believe it yourself. It is the saddest thing in the life of any alien minority that it settles down to that opinion concerning it which is held by the ruling majority.

Yet the outstanding fact is incontrovertible that, as I wrote some twelve years ago myself, we have with us a large body of nominal Jews, who neither live nor think as Jews, forming in every community a compact society apart held together by the sheer force of the social ban, an ethnic aggregate of Jews according to the flesh, a prey to every fad and religious vagary ("Christian Science," for instance), as well as to every disintegrating influence, themselves a disintegrating factor in the larger community of which they are a part. I wrote then further: "If the state is, perhaps, constructed on economic lines, society is not. Unreasoned and unreasonable emotions wield a tremendous power for the very reason that they well up from the depths of the soul. Instinct, not reason, governs society. And instinct inexorably decrees fusion. It laughs at assimilation, which is never a perfect imitation, and therefore ludicrous. It tolerates least of all a vulgarity which has not the native stamp. It cares little for morals, and a great deal for manners. The Christian (?) clubman is not concerned with fine and hair-splitting theological distinctions. He sees in the Jewish organization, in spite of all its latitudinarianism, an alien body. He will here and there recognize the individual Jew as an exception, and he will demand, not in so many words, but clearly enough to him who has ears to hear, that that Jew sever his social connections with his Jewish brethren, in other words, renounce his Judaism. What baptism does for the Jew on the continent, mere renunciation of Judaism will accomplish in the anglo-Saxon countries, although affiliation with a Christian religious body will facilitate matters, and is being resorted to by the ultra-fashionables. For where, within Jewry itself, the various synagogues of a community are so many rungs on the social ladder, with the 'Temple' on the top, communion in the Unitatrian or Episcopalian church confers vastly superior social prestige."

Where Mr. Boas and I part company, however, is in the first place the historical perspective. We are wont to speak in high terms of the Spanish period in our history. It is well known, however, that great as the number was of those who suffered martyrdom and exile, a very large body of Jews preferred the comfort that goes with wealth and station in one's habitual surroundings at the cost of apostasy. Jewish blood flows in the veins of many a Spanish grandee. The persecutions that we hear of and which were attended by all the horrors of the inquisitions, were directed against those who recanted or who practiced Judaism in secret. With the faithful it went well. But farther back in biblical times there were those that were at ease in Zion and showed no concern with the breach of Joseph. And in the wilderness our forefathers lusted for the fleshpots of Egypt. If I read our history aright, there has been a constant conflict between the large mass of the people who were given to enjoyment like the rest of the peoples, and the righteous remnant gathered about the prophets and teachers who built up the conviction that Israel must not be like others, that he must forswear the flesh to gain the spirit. At all times the allurements of foreign modes of life were too strong to be resisted by the multitude. The Maccabees were but a small band. There were always those who withdrew from the sordid present into the idealized past and into the ideal future. But this glorification of the past and the future served as a stimulus, and many were won back to God. All religions look upon the present or earthly existence as a preparation for something nobler. What buoyed up the Jew was the hope of the new order of things to which the present was the prelude, the antechamber. There is further in every religious body a distinction between passive and active members, between the serious-minded and the lukewarm. Nothing but the overt act of apostasy unmakes the Jew, but even then he may recant and be received back. So long as a Jew passively remains within the pale, he may not be the model Jew, but a Jew he is and feels himself to be nevertheless. There is many a man who obtains his world in one hour. When the crucial test comes, the Jew asserts himself, the Jew who is at one with his God and his people. We may make light of the Jew who is a casual visitor in the synagogue, the high holidays Jew. But it indicates that the thread, slender though it may sometimes be, has not snapped altogether. And lastly, before I take up a much more important point, it is incorrect that Zionism "is essentially a movement to help some one else." Not for some one else, but for the Jewish people do the Zionists labor. The Zionist appraisal of conditions in the dispersion is rightly or wrongly akin to Mr. Boas' own diagnosis. And because the Zionist does not cherish any hope for the maintenance of Jewry in non-Jewish environments, because he foresees the extinction of the Jewish race through slow but inevitable attrition, he would betimes create a center where the remnant of Judah may continue to exist and carry on the traditions of our history. And here again the appeal may be made to history. A small band only returned under Zerubbabel and Ezra. The majority remained behind. And yet the culture that was built up anew on Mount Zion was powerful enough to check the centrifugal forces of dispersed Jewry. The enthusiasm enkindled in the homeland spread eastward and westward. Palestinian Jewry dominated the diaspora.

The chief point, however, is the writer's misrepresentation of the party slogans in Jewry. He ought to know that to the Christian all Jews are orthodox. Chamberlain calls Claude Montefiore an orthodox Jew. We have our differences. But the reformer will rightly maintain that he is far from being an agnostic. What individual Jews may choose to be matters little. The reform synagogue is a conservative force. It has kept the Jew within the ranks. Moreover, as I have pointed out again and again, the reform synagogue, by its very affirmation that though it has liberalized itself in conformity to the spirit of the age, perhape sometimes yielding too much and going in the line of least resistance, it refuses to concede that salvation lies only in the church, stands as a challenge to Christianity that the truth cannot be there where it places it. And this stubborn resistance to the opinions of the majority is a profound lesson in the freedom of conscience which the world needs. Neither by persecutions nor by the blandishments of ease can the synagogue be swayed from its course. It is immortal to yield to the majority. Minorities have their right of existence. Most of all in religious matters. We shall not give way in being hypnotized into the majority's opinion that we have persisted for naught, just merely by the momentum of the past. That momentum is not to be gainsaid. So long as Christianity maintains that it is the true heir of ancient Israel, the Jew will persist to demonstrate that the Jewish truth has been perverted abroad and that the Jewish people is the vessel of the ancient truth. In this conviction orthodox and reformers share alike. Both the orthodox of the old stamp and the reformer believe that they can maintain themselves against all the corroding influences of the diaspora. Both look for surcease in the future which both place in the Messianic period, differ as they may in their conception of the nature of the surcease. They admit that conditions at present are rather difficult. So they call for sacrifices. We all know that it is not easy to live the Jewish life. No ideal is easy to uphold. But upheld it must be at all hazards. Our various organizations all have for their aim the strengthening of the Jewish consciousness. Every Jewish home is an island in the sea of humanity. Every Jewish house of worship is a center of the Jewish culture. Therein indeed lies the supreme difficulty. But when the Christian enters the church he is not quite wholly on his own domain either. He sings of Jerusalem and Zion, not of Washington and the Capital. Religion is bound up with other wordliness, that is with an order of things, be it past or future or both, which is not of the present order of things. If the Christian must look for his inspiration in the distant hills of Judea, surely the Jew may. In the synagogue the Jewish soul is liberated. There alone the humdrum Jew, torn amidst so many conflicts, becomes idealized into the full Jew, to whom nothing Jewish is alien. Judaism is not vague by any manner of means. There have been Jewish creeds, though they have not exhausted the whole wealth of content. The shortest creed, as I have said elsewhere, is found in the Book of Prayer. "All this is everlastingly true and established with us, that He is the Lord our God, and there is none beside Him, and we are Israel His people." And I may conclude in the words of my former paper: "The Roman Catholic Church answered the hostile movements of the nineteenth century with the dogma of the infallibility of her head. Israel, with equal firmness, must meet the Anti-Semitism of the day with the unequivocal reaffirmation of her divine election."

THE B'NAI B'RITH AND SOCIAL SERVICE.

Social workers who have had professional training are fond of carping at the meager results of the Social Service Department in the B'nai B'rith. They speak of the want of program and of the lack of concentration, of the dangers of the volunteer system of social work, with something of a sneer. Perhaps their facts are correct. Their interpretation of them is distinctly unfriendly.

Even the friends of this work which the Order has undertaken realize the difficulty of bringing into play a definite program of service with only volunteers to command. They understand that there are bound to be some different thoughts, a great deal of waste in human effort, and not a few mistakes. The Big Brother movement, the Free Employment Center, though they represent definite attempts to concentrate social effort, are still subject to the limitations under which personal service must be tendered when undertaken by men, many of whom are just beginning to think socially or communally.

The great thing this movement has meant, and this lost sight of by the critics of the Order's work, is the popularization of certain social concepts. The advancement of a certain sympathy and interest in the right, and organized way of dealing with honesty and its miseries. In a time when, in spite of all the educational forces that have been generated to popularize the social point of view, the great majority of even enlightened men and women like to weep upon the shoulders of the poor and to feel the personal afterglow of self-satisfaction which comes from doling alms. The interest, discussion, as well as the practical work of such a department as that of the B'nai B'rith becomes another mighty educational force, operating often in virgin fields.

There are great groups of people who believe that organized philanthropy is extravagant, cold, far from humane, machine-made. To have the contrasting gospel come through an Order devoted to benevolence, brotherly love and harmony is to break down these unfortunate preconceptions.—E. W. Leipziger, in Jewish Spectator.

WHAT IS TO BECOME OF THE POLISH JEWS?

The "Juedische Rundschau" (issue No. 46) is devoting a special editorial to the needs of the Polish Jews, under the caption, "What Is to Become of the Polish Jews?"

The paper points out that at the beginning of the war, lofty promises were made to the Polish Jews, but states that what the German authorities in the Occupied Territory have done in behalf of the Polish Jews, and what they have left undone, gives ample reason for protest.

A feeling of utmost uneasiness took hold of the Jews, when after the proclamation of the Polish Autonomy, the General Governor published the first most important measures connected with it, viz: the establishment of a "State Council" (Staatsrat) and a "United Diet" (Vereinigter Landtag). This decision, although promising the Poles self-government to a certain degree, seems to exclude the Jews from taking active part in the new government affairs. The proportional vote was introduced for Warsaw, Lodz, and ten other districts only. Thus, at the best, but one-third of the one and a half million Jews of the Warsaw district will be represented in the "Landtag." According to existing conditions, it is impossible for a Jew to secure a seat in the State Council, which consists of twelve members. Therefore, only the General Governor can select one Jew out of the four members he is to appoint himself. "Nobody will say," writes the paper, "that such prospects reflect a proper state of affairs, but everyone familiar with the situation must admit that under these circumstances the position of the Jews in Poland is soon bound to become intolerable."

The last events in the Warsaw Town Council, considered by the Poles as a sort of temporary Polish "Reichstag" in session till the election of a general parliamentary body, might be looked at as a characteristic prelude. The best efforts of this institution in such a fateful hour are devoted to the invention of new laws against Jews which are "as stupid as they are shameful and degrading." The right to sell salt is to be taken away from the Jewish dealers; in the market-halls the Jewish dealers are cut off from their Christian neighbors, put into the back rows of the market-hall, into a kind of new ghetto, the medieval form of the modern boycott Such humiliating measures are numberless. The Polish speakers of the Town Council are showing a most brutal contempt for the Jews, a contempt hitherto found only in pogrom proclamations.

The Poles are behaving as though the most urgent task of the hour was the fighting out of the Polish-Jewish issue at once. Hygienic and social conditions of Warsaw, its finances as well as the question of food supply are neglected. The Town Council has on its mind instead, the matter of keeping the Jewish people within bounds and of causing them injury and harm. That is the problem to be solved immediately.

"It is clear," goes on the paper, "that the Poles have set out to crush the Jewish people. It seems incompatible with the Poles that a population of two millions, not of their own blood, should live with them. As there is no shadow of likelihood that the Jews ever will become part of the Polish nation (a possibility, furthermore, the Poles would never agree to see realized), the only way of settling with the Jews is to crush them, have them enslaved, force them to emigrate. . . . The Poles have no mercy for the Jews, and unless clear guarantees are obtained and measures taken at the very beginning, there is no hope at all for the Jewish people in Poland!"

It was hoped that efficient measures for safeguarding of the rights of national minorities against the Polish nationalism would be taken simultaneously at the new formation of things. It is not a question of Jews only. No wonder that the Ruthenes in Galicia struggle desperately against being handed over to Polish justice and sympathy! The proclamation of a "State Council" and a "United Diet" in the Polish Kingdom contains no hint regarding guarantees. We dare not believe that it is intended by the German authorities to neglect such protective measure. We hope, we expect, and we urge that without any further delay guarantees be secured, safeguarding for the national minorities in Poland their rights—the possibility of their very existence.

It is a good and safe rule to sojourn in every place as if you meant to spend your life there, never omitting an opportunity of doing a kindness or speaking a true word or making a friend.—John Ruskin.

Why Every Jew Should be a Member of the B'nai B'rith

By Mr. Moses M. Schwarz

If some imaginary power were to suddenly stretch forth an invisible hand and strip Judaism of its robes of ceremony, were to suddenly divest it of the veil of symbolism woven about it, and efface from its outward form, every distinguishing feature, its spiritual potency would remain unimpaired by the defacement, for Judaism does not derive its sustenance from these external superficial sources. Idealism is the fountain head that nourishes Judaism's vitality, the ailment which enriches its life blood and stimulates its organic action. The fire of idealism throughout the ages has illumined the pathway of Judaism, and its beneficent warmth has generated the inspiration which has propelled Israel in its march, ever forward, despite the countless obstacles it has encountered in its course.

Because the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in its various benevolent activities provides a medium for practical expression of Jewish Idealism is the paramount reason why every Jew, within whose breast there burns a spark of racial pride or love for the traditions of his ancesters, should be a member of this altruistic organization. Inasmuch as the B'nai B'rith is fundamentally a Jewish fraternity, it is quite natural that it should appeal more strongly to the Jew who is most loyal to the faith of the Fathers than to the Israelite in whose composition the racial instinct is a negligible element. However, there is no reason why the Jew, whose emotions are apathetic to the glory of the ancestral traditions of his race, should not be just as enthusiastic in support of the Order as his more ardent brother, for while the B'nai B'rith stands for the perpetuity of Judaism, its broad humanitarianism contains the essence of religion without narrowness of creed. In the splendid Temple which the B'nai B'rith has reared upon the firm foundation of the brotherhood of men, all Israelites of every degree of religious intensity,—Orthodok and Reform, Radical and Conservative, Liberal and Bigoted, — can gather in harmonious accord to make sacrifices on the altar of benevolence.

Some seventy years ago, a small number of unselfish Jews, actuated by the lofty motives of philanthropy, formed in the City of New York an organization which had for its purpose the more efficient distribution of local charity. From the seeds of altruism thus sown there has germinated the great benevolent Order, B'nai B'rith, which, not content with confining its humanitarian activities to the Western Hemisphere, has crossed the broad Atlantic and invaded Great Brittain, Continental Europe and Palestine with its banner of Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony. The extent of the B'nai B'rith beneficence is limited only by the extent of its resources and in the degree that its resources are multiplied, its capacity for service to humanity will be proportionately enhanced. Therefore, it behooves every dweller in the house of Israel to come forth and enlist in the great army of altruists who are ever marching forward to battle with poverty and distress, to struggle with disease and infirmity, to wage war on iniquity and injustice, and to strike in defense of the widow and orphan. To the individual inspired by motives of [illegible] fers little or no attraction, for it holds out to him no promise of direct benefit or reward for his support, and to this undesirable type of the "genus homo" little satisfaction is derived from the consciousness of duty well performed; but to the man, whose heart throbs in sympathetic unison with that of the grief stricken widow, whose ears are not deaf to the piteous appeal of the orphan, and whose emotions are stirred by the sorrows of mankind, the B'nai B'rith stretches forth an irresistible, beckoning hand.

In performing its mission of responding affirmatively to the question of that ancient cynic, "Am I my brother's keeper?" the B'nai B'rith has demonstrated in the highest degree the wisdom and efficiency of systematic organization in philanthropic endeavor over the haphazard method of individual almsgiving, which is always fraught with the grave possibility of innocently, but nevertheless, unjustly withholding aid from deserving applicants and bestowing it upon unworthy ones. These very regrettable instances are eliminated by the wise exercise of discrimination, which regularly organized bodies, created for the purpose of [illegible] charity practice. The Ben B'rith enjoys the satisfaction of knowing that every dollar contributed by him to his organization is so capable and efficiently administered that it produces far more beneficial results than could be obtained by him in individual effort. The many eleemosynary institutions which the B'nai B'rith, in discharging the obligations it has assumed to relieve poverty and distress and alleviate pain and suffering, assists in maintaining, are monumental memorials of its conception of humanitarian duty. The ideals which govern the B'nai B'rith in its unselfish labors, permit of no narrow construction of the law of humanity, therefore its institutions of healing are open to the followers of all faiths and not restricted to the Jew. The applicant who knocks at the door of one of its hospitals is not questioned by the B'nai B'rith as to which of the several paths that lead to the Kingdom of Heaven he is treading, and this disregard of sect in the application of its benefits on suffering mankind has won for it the approbation and esteem of Jew and non-Jew alike.

The best methods to be used in assisting the unfortunate of mankind is a problem that has long engaged the attention of sociologists, economists and welfare workers, for it is realized that tactless and indiscreet distribution of charity is often accompanied by the most baneful consequences. The achievement of a purpose is often frustrated by the manner in which the purpose is sought to be achieved, and this fact is frequently illustrated in the well intentioned but misguided efforts of uninformed and impractical would-be givers of charity. Pauperizing the poor is a paradoxical term, but pregnant with significance, for the unfortunate victim of circumstances on whom it is desired to bestow alms may, by the tactless method employed, be robbed of self-respect, and this impoverishes him immeasurably more than if he were denied the material aid. Helping others to help themselves is a practical mode of social uplift employed by the B'nai B'rith, and has always been found fruitful of desirable results. This system not only preserves this self-respect of the recipient of aid, but inspires him with self-confidence, and animates him with a desire to improve his spiritual and moral as well as his material welfare.

In the procurement of social justice for the outcasts of society, the Social Service Department of the B'nai B'rith is performing service of such a commendable character as to attract widespread attention. Under its auspices, the Big Brother movement has been instituted in many of the cities of the country with gratifying results. Moral delinquents are removed from unwholesome surroundings, and their lives reshaped by being placed in the homes of big brothers, where the criminal instinct is stifled and immoral tendencies eradicated. Emissaries of this department visit prisons and secure releases of victims of unjustifiable sentences, who, after being taken from their degrading surroundings, are placed in environments conducive to proper living, thereby opening the way for them to become good and useful citizens. The scope of the Social Service Department's labor activities is constantly on the increase, and it promises to be a most valuable adjunct to the work of the Order. No Jew, possessing a knowledge of the benefits conferred on humanity by the B'nai B'rith, can remain callous to the fact that it is his duty to participate in its great uplifting movements. That many are ignorant of the extent and character of its benevolence is undoubtedly the reason why a larger proportion of the Jews in this country are not embraced in its membership. Every Ben B'rith should constitute himself a propaganda committee of one to enlighten his uninformed brethren to the end that they may properly assume the moral obligation which Judaism imposes upon them.

The B'nai B'rith, not content with performing mutifarious duties in the world of philanthropy, has also, through the Anti-Defamation League, become the defender of the name of the Jew against slander and unjust attacks. Before the advent of the league, the Jew was often humiliated in the public press by improper use of the word "Jew" and allusions to the race where only an individual was concerned and on the stage by obnoxious caricatures and grossly exaggerated portrayals of Jewish unrefinement. The work of the league has shown that most of the injustices perpetrated in the press are the result of ignorance, and not attributed to prejudice or willful desire to hurt the Jew. The protests of the league are always made in a dignified manner, and uniformly elicit a courteous response from the editor or writer to whom the protest is made. We have an illustration of the league's excellent work, as well as an indication of the prestige of the B'nai B'rith in a recent incident. The league called the attention of the Washington Government to a passage in a book used in the Army Service Schools which dealt unfairly with the Jew. The protest was referred to the War Department, and after investigation, the injustice of the offending passage was admitted and ordered eliminated from the book.

And so the B'nai B'rith, in its varied activities, presents countless reasons why every Jew should be a member of the Order, and assist in the fulfillment of its mission of uniting Israel and promoting the welfare of humanity. "Be thou a blessing," was God's injunction to Abraham, and that he should become a blessing, not to himself, but to mankind, is the lesson that is inculcated into the mind of the Ben B'rith, the ambition that is instilled into his heart. It is the cloud bv day and the pillar of fire by night that guides him on his journey of life. It is the bugle blast that awakens him from his lethargic slumber of indifference and arouses his consciousness to a clear conception of his duty to God, to man and to himself, and it is the battle hymn which all Israelites should unite in singing as they march forward to battle in the service of humanity under the flag of Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony.

ARE YOU A BIG BROTHER?

Folder Issued by the Social Service Committee of the Central B'nai B'rith Council

In order to keep Jewish boys out of the courts and out of the class of dependents, the B'nai B'rith is calling upon all its members to take an active part in the Jewish Big Brother Movement recently established in the City of Chicago by the Central B'nai B'rith Council.

Boys who lack proper home influences and who are in danger of becoming misled by bad companions, as well as boys who need the help of an older friend, are introduced to members of the Order who are asked to take the same sort of interest in the boys as an older brother would take in his own younger brother: to direct the boys in their recreation, study and religious training, and advise them generally regarding their welfare. In this work, the Big Brothers are directed by the Secretary of the Social Service Committee, who will always be ready to assist them and advise them.

Are you interested in becoming a Big Brother? Do you know of any boys who need Big Brothers? If so, communicate with the Secretary, L. Edward Lashman, 1228 Tribune Building. Telephone, Randolph 1011.

The brethren undertaking this work will find that they derive as much satisfaction from being Big Brothers as the Little Brothers find benefit in being assisted by them.

Suggestions to Big Brothers.

1. Don't take more than one boy.

2. Our aim is to prevent delinquency rather than correct it. Don't ask for a "bad boy." Just help your boy to remain good and you will be doing your share in preventing the appearance of Jewish boys in court.

3. Don't preach to your boy.

4. At no time mention the fact that you are a "Big Brother," or that your boy is a "Little Brother." Let the friendship be a natural one. Just let him feel that you are interested in him—that he has an older and wiser friend.

5. At no time give up your supervision of the boy. The boy's welfare is at stake. If you have difficulty, notify this office.

6. Don't attempt to accomplish too much at the start. First become acquainted with your boy and his surroundings; then plan for his physical, mental and moral improvement.

8. Do not give financial assistance except as a last resort. Before so doing, consult the office.

9. Keep his evening occupied. Find out his interests and participate in them.

10. Keep your boy at school as long as possible. If he works, encourage him to attend night school.

11. Urge him to join a good Boys' Club, or the Boy Scouts. This office has a list of the boys' clubs and the scout troops nearest the home of your boy.

12. Take him to the Public Libary. Sign a library card for him.

13. Help your boy start a bank account. Induce him to make a small deposit each week.

14. Take your boy with you to synagogue. Enroll him in Sabbath School.

15. Meet the Boys' Club leader, teacher, employer.

16. Invite him to your office and occasionally to your home. DON'T introduce him as your Little Brother. Just mention that he is a friend of yours.

17. Look out for the boy's health. If you suspect any physical defects—adenoids, eye trouble, neglected teeth, enlarged tonsils, etc., have him examined by your physician or dentist, or notify this office and we shall provide medical attention.

18. Has your boy a good position which offers advancement and promotion? If not, this office will aid you in securing a better position for your boy. Suggest to the boy the advantages of learning a trade or profession.

19. Attend the Big Brother meetings. Experiences will be exchanged, typical cases discussed and definite methods of work will be outlined. A talk on the "psychology of the boy" will be given at each meeting.

20. Be able to report some progress in the case of each boy—that he has started a bank account, is attending school, has joined a club, or belongs to the library.

21. Get your friends to do what you are doing. Remember, there are hundreds of Jewish boys in Chicago who need Big Brothers.

22. Remember that our office contains a list of all boys' schools, clubs, gymnasiums, employment agencies, etc. We keep a record of every case, some of which information may be helpful to you. The Secretary is there all day to answer inquiries and to help you at all times. Make use of the facilities of our office. We are located in the Tribune Building, Room 1228. 'Phone Randolph 1011.

BIG BROTHER CASES.

LEONARD—This is an interesting case of a boy, who through negligence, developed a deformity which incapacitated him for work. His parents, who are in Russia, sent him over here at an early age and he managed to earn a livelihood. He developed tuberculosis of the spine, but neglected attending to it, and as a result became deformed. Our attention was called to the case while the boy was being treated at a non-Jewish dispensary. We sent him to one of our Jewish hospitals where he received treatment for the disease. One of the members of our Order, a physician, became a Big Brother to this boy. He has been fitted with a brace, which enables him to stand erect and is now in a position to secure employment and so render himself self-supporting.

JOE B.—In a quarrel between his parents, Joe in defending his mother, struck his father, who brought him before the Juvenile Court. He was paroled by the Judge, but on his return home, was refused admittance. He boarded with some non-Jewish companions and after several weeks was joined by his brother, who also left home. Two days after being joined by his brother, he and his brother were arrested in a shooting affray, in which his brother shot and killed another boy. One of the members of our Order, an attorney, interested himself in the boy, defending him at the inquest and at the trial. He secured a position for the boy and also induced an aunt to take the boy into her home. The boy now reports regularly to his Big Brother and feels that he is influencing Joe toward better things.

JULIAN W.—Julian's case was called to the attention of this office by the principal of his school. It appears that he was slow in his work and at times unruly. One of our Big Brothers became interested in the boy and learned the following facts in his case: The boy is the son of a drunken and shiftless father who does not contribute anything to the support of the boy. The boy and his father have been boarding with a non-Jewish woman who has been keeping Julian almost entirely at her own expense. The Big Brother called upon a well-to-do uncle of this boy and after much persuasion induced this uncle to take care of the boy. The boy will now be taken into this man's home and will be put into a special class for boys, where he will receive individual instruction. The Big Brother keeps in constant touch with the boy.

ANNUAL CONVENTION

The fifty-fourth annual session of District Grand Lodge No. 4, I. O. B. B., convened according to law Sunday, Feb. 18, 1917, with a full representation in attendance.

The Sabbath eve service preceding the session took place at Temple Israel, corner California and Webster. A large congregation was present and Col. Harris Weinstock, a member of Etham Lodge No. 37, delivered the address of the evening. The services were chanted by the Cantor of the congregation, Bro. B. Liederman. The Rabbi, Bro. Jacob Nieto, deliver the invocation.

Immediately after the opening Sunday morning, President Henry Newburgh delivered his annual address which was conspicuous for its directness, business tone and terseness in the handling of the individual subjects. It was received with genuine esteem.

At 2 p. m. a memorial service was held in honor of the memory of Rabbi Jacob Bloch of Portland, Ore., and Past Grand Presidents Rabbi M. S. Levy and Herman Gutstadt. Brother Dr. A. Tilzer of Portland read a biographical sketch of Brother Bloch, showing the deceased in all his loyalty to the Order.

Past Grand President, Bro. I. M. Golden, eulogized Brother Levy in most eloquent terms as a lover of his people and God's messenger to the suffering and the downcast.

Past Grand President, Bro. Otto Irving Wise, in a masterly address held the Grand Lodge spellbound as he unrolled the good qualities of the man he took for his theme; namely, brother Gutstadt. He knew the deceased intimately.

Monday evening, February 19, there was a reception to the delegates and visiting ladies at the St. Francis Hotel, on which occasion the Grand Orator, Bro. Dr. Martin A. Meyer, delivered the annual oration. A most instructive discourse.

The representatives were put to a tremendous strain by the debates occasioned by the report of the Committee on Legislation. The committee decided affirmatively a lodge query whether a proselyte who failed to have the Abrahamic rite performed on him was eligible for membership in the Order. The debate took a wide range; from an interpretation of the Laws of the Order to learned disquisitions on the Talmud, and the excitement at times became intense. In order that an authoritative decision may finally be reached the report of the committee was approved, but notice of appeal given immediately. The problem will now be up for solution to the Court of Appeals.

At the close of the session the retiring President, Brother Newburgh, was presented with a memento, testifying to the love and high regard in which he is held by the membership at large.

The General Laws of the District were thoroughly revised and every vestige of Endowment Legislation eliminated. Obsolete provisions were removed and the laws were made to conform to present conditions. The most important piece of legislation, considered so by the Grand Lodge, was the reorganization of the General Committee. The Board of Trustees, consisting of three members having become inocuous, was abolished and in its place there were elected five Past Grand Presidents, though the opportunity was open to other aspirants. The General Committee will have charge of all the Social Service and Anti-Defamation work as well as control of the Library. All this, in addition to the duties already devolving upon the committee under the Constitution, will make the body a very active and strenuous one.

A substantial sum was appropriated for Social Service work, but "with the distinct understanding that no portion of it should be applied for local work in any community and that the lodges in each town or city shall finance their own local need". It may be here added that, though the sum appropriated is $1,200.00, the increase of this year's per capita over last year's amounts to only 10c.

The usual greetings from Sister Districts, subordinate lodges and individual members were thankfully received.

The fifty-fifth session of the District Grand Lodge will be held on the third Sunday in February, 1918, in the city of Fresno, Cal.

B. Changing the ages of members of the Youths' Auxiliary from thirteen to twenty-one and dividing the membership in two classes.

Resolutions.

A. That no member of a Woman's Auxiliary Lodge may affiliate with a sister auxiliary without permission of the lodge of which she was a member.

B. That a special committee be appointed to investigate the situation in District No. 4 with reference to orphans, who for some reason or other cannot gain admission into existing Jewish orphan asylums in this District.

President David N. Mosessohn.

C. Appealing to the Executive Committee not to adopt any rules on the allottment of propaganda moneys whereby District No. 4 would be deprived of a proper allowance of propaganda support for the year 1916 and the year subsequent thereto as provided for by the General Convention of 1915.

Reports Adopted.

First—The Committee on "Jewish Congress" reported that it favors and approves the Order's activity and participation in the work of the Congress; that it notes with much satisfaction and pride the important part President Kraus took in the preliminary conference; that it unqualifiedly approved and endorses the Jewish congress and pledges to it the Order's enthusiastic support; that it favors a democratic method of selecting representatives.

Second—The special committee on the report of the Commitee on Legislation which embraces the query by one of our subordinate lodges regarding the admission of a proselyte already alluded to in the introduction, reported in favor of approving the decision an appeal from said decision to the Court of Appeals and recommending that some members take the necessary steps to carry out the suggestion. Notice of appeal was at once given.

Third—The Committee on Membership recommended that necessary steps be taken to amend the Constitution of the Order so that the age of admission be lowered to eighteen. The committee expressed its approval of several suggestions made by the President in his report such as "membership committees", "lecture bureaus" and the "abolition of sick benelts to new members".

Fourth—The Committee on Social Service heartily commended the work of the Social Service Committee and approves of the praise bestowed upon it by the President in his report.

The committee recommends the appropriation of $1,200.00 "to be expended under the supervision and direction of the General Commitee, but with the distinct understanding that no part of it should be expended for local work in any community and that the lodges in each community shall finance their own local need".

Fifth—The Committee on Women's Auxiliaries recommends the appointment of a special committee to formulate a ritual for use by the auxiliaries. Also that no dues be exacted from the auxiliaries for Grand Lodge purposes.

Sixth—The Committee on Necrology recommended that memorial pages be set aside one each to the memory of those for whom memorial services were held and one collective page for all other deceased Past Presidents.

Seventh—The Committee on Dormant Lodges recommended that Berkeley Lodge Charter be declared forfeited by the General Committee, but that Helena, Montana, Lodge, who offered its charter, be given an opportunity to demonstrate to the incoming Grand Officers its inability to continue.

Eighth—The Committee on "San Francisco" made several recommendations such as approval of this course of the District Deputies; membership contests, but disapproved of the "entire abolition of sick benefits".

Ninth—The Committe on Lecture Bureau recommended that the Grand Secretary keep a list of brethren available as lecturers and that the lodges who desire their services should make their selection and inform the Grand Secretary of their wishes and also of their intention to defray the expenses in connection therewith.

Tenth—The Committee on State of the Order reported its approval of the following subjects in the President's report. The President's comment on the services of Brother Simon Wolf; on the efforts in connection with the raising of funds for the Jewish War Sufferers; on the condition of the Order in the District; on the importance that he attaches to the office of District Deputy; on the subject of separate meeting places for the lodges; on the manner in which lodge meetings should be conducted; on the benefit the existence of B'nai B'rith Lodges bestow upon smaller communities; on the usefulness of the Committee of Fifty, the Youths' Auxiliary, Kiddies' Day and the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society; on the worth of the Jewish Orphans' Home in Southern California; on the value of the Anti-Defamation League; on the course pursued by the General Committee regarding certain legislation proposed by the Anti-Defamation League against discriminations in public places and finally on all the Deputy reports submitted to said committee.

Telegrams of greetings were read from President Kraus of Chicago, Secretary Brother Kaplan of District No. 1, Secretary Brother Abraham of District No. 2, from Portland Lodge No. 416, Lasker Lodge No. 370, Social Service Director, Brother Rudolph I. The Emergency Relief assessment will be levied in the months of May and October.

WARSAW AND JABNEH.

By Rabbi Dr. Friedmann.

The opening of the Polish university Warsaw may justly be pronounced and praised as a prominent and uncommon deed of the present time. In the midst of the war tumult the most important cultural need of the Polish people and not less so of the Polish Jews, was satisfied by the opening of the high schools. It is just as the Rector said at the opening festivity in the aula of the university, the Polish people, who always had at heart education in general and higher education in particular, will know how to properly value this act. The Governor General, his Excellency Von Beseler could also designate the great event as "the beginning of an era of a new spiritual life."

Those of the enemies of and adversaries of the German Empire who perhaps still doubted that Germany will really bring freedom to the Poles, those of them who would still accuse the German Empire of striving to rule the world and of the highest "militarism," will now be of a different mind and will be forced to admit that the German Empire fosters the love of liberty and higher education even during the terribly and grivously earnest war. For only this love could have induced the victorious Germany to grant the wish of the Polish people and to fulfill the promise of the confederates so quickly even before the ending of the terrible world war. Yes, Warsaw has become a new marked leaf and a characterizing sign of the love of the German Empire for freedom and truth, for genuine education.

But this great event of the opening of the Warsaw university reminds one involuntarily of a similar occurrence, 1845 years ago which furnished (also in the midst of the war tumult) special proof of the deeply rooted love of Judaism to freedom and education. While Jerusalem was still besieged by the Romans and all further resistance against the superior power of Rome was recognized by the moderates among the Jews as useless, then the first thing thought of was the preservation of freedom and education for the youth, their transmission to the younger generation. Therefore Johanan Ben Zakkai sought to come before Vespasian and to attain from him, if possible, the granting of his wishes in this regard. And he succeeded in deceiving the watchfulness of the party of zealots to leave the city and to step humbly before Vespasian to whom he stated his three requests, namely the consent to the preservation of the academy in Jabneh, the sparing of the remnant of the house of Hillel and the granting of medical aid to the fellow student, Zadok, who had become frail from fasting and privations. Vespasian granted all the requests to the hoary headed Johanan so that Jabneh (Jamina) became the seat of the Sanhedrim and stepped into part of the rights which were originally due to Jerusalem.

So will a comparison between Warsaw and Jabneh become a new proof of the relation of the German idea with the view of Judaism, the German mind and spirit with the Jewish soul and ideal thought.

HASIDISM

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

Philosophy of religion is a very simple subject, complex as it may occasionally appear. All religious controversies are based on the struggle between ritualism and emotionalism, strict dogmatism, and spirituality, hierarchy and democracy. There are great differences in the form of expression, but the principle is always the same.

Applying it to the history of modern Judaism, we can easily understand the Hasidic movement. From the Maccabean period on Judaism developed the minuteness of legal observance. This is based on the strongest force in historic evolution, on contrast. Antiochus, the tyrant, aimed at a complete absorption of the Jews with their neighbors. He found that their religious practices were the strongest impediment in the way of realizing this ambition. He, therefore, prohibited the practice of the law. The effect of the measure was that the Jews, not only adhered to their tradition with greater enthusiasm, but developed the law, now doubly sacred to them, in all details.

This contrast gained in force with the beginning of Christianity. The theological conception, which we call after the Apostle Paul stood for a religion that was one of emotion, and not of ritualistic observance. It declared the law a curse. Its opponents saw in this philosophy a movement, aimed at the complete annihilation of Judaism. They stuck more tenaciously than ever before, to their traditions, and declared that not a jot or a tittle of the law should ever perish. From this time on, which I place in the second century, the legal development of Judaism continued without an interruption. The literature grew to such immense proportions that an attempt had to be made to systematize it, so as to make it accessible. The method of an alphabetical index had not been invented and various authors applied different methods to compile a digest of the Jewish Law. The most successful of all attempts of this kind was the Schulchan Aruk, completed by Joseph Caro, in Safed in 1564. It may appear strange that a textbook which gives us explicit directions for the way in which we shall dress, wash our hands, eat, recite our prayers, keep our holy days, teach our children, show respect to our elders, dispense charity, conduct our business, show our joy and our grief, etc., should be actuated by mystic motives. Yet such was the case. Judaism had gone through a terrible crisis by the end of the fifteenth century, Jews were expelled from Spain and Portugal, from the kingdom of Naples, from numerous districts and individual cities and there was no end of it in sight. Among the various remedies suggested, naturally was the attempt to unite all Israel. Our present era shows a similar experience. In order to unite all Israel, the religious observances should be unified. Joseph Caro, who had left Spain as a child of four years with his parents, and gone through all the terrible experiences of homeless exiles, finally settled in Palestine. Here was the home of the Jewish people. Here the corner-stone for a new united Israel should be laid. The law that would go forth from Zion should unite all Israel.

It is significant that in the same city of Safed, there lived at that time a number of mystics, who had gone there like Joseph Caro, expecting the Messianic age. They were not interested so much in the law, because their religion was more one of emotion. One might compare them to a Salvation Army band, or to some of these movements that we know by the name of God's Bible School, Sons of David etc., as they spring up in America from time to time. Like them these mystics were not negative. They did not attack any of the traditional practices, and in all likelihood were strictly observant, but their worship was characterized by violent physical movements and vague notions about their relation to the divine.

This movement continues as the sufferings of the Jews continue. It received its strongest impetus, when in 1666 Sabbatai Zebi in Smyrna declared himself the Messiah. Mental diseases are more contagious than physical ones. [illegible] from the latter one may attempt to escape, but from the former it is dangerous to do so. You do not have to simulate the symptoms of smallpox, but if you try to be sane, when others are crazy, you are an enemy to public [illegible]. In this way Sabbatai Zebi obtained an immense following. The weak [illegible] wanted to believe in him, and the few who were of sound mind had [illegible]. Fortunately the movement ended in a farce. Sabbatai Zebi was placed by the Sultan before the alternative of having himself roasted alive on a spit, or renouncing Judaism. He chose the line of least resistance. Had he done what other religious enthusiasts did, and had he become a martyr to his cause, the movement would have assumed large proportions, people would have seen him arise from the dead, perform miracles, and continue his teachings in visions. Goethe characterized this farce well when he said: "Als der Prophet nicht geriet, da ward er ein Tuerke zu Stambul; Freund, sei vernuenftig, wie er, werde Du jetzt Philosoph."

The masses of the people are not likely to accept advice from men like Goethe. They did not do it in the seventeenth century. Sabbatai Zebi had turned a Mohammedan and was given a job in the Sultan's palace, but the people still stood in need of a mystic interpretation of life, that would help them forget their troubles, by pointing to a miraculous change that was to come. There would be fewer labor strikes if our masses could be hypnotized by such Messianic teachings. The majority of the Jews, or at any rate a very large fraction of the Jewish people, were then already living in Poland. They were not oppressed by legal disabilities, as were their brethren in western Europe, but they were constantly threatened by acts of violence in this much-disturbed country, they were at the mercy of the nobles and of the mob. How could they reconcile this fact with God's promises to those who would observe this law? The answer was simple enough. They were not good enough, not pious enough, did not devote enough time to the study of God's law, and, which was the main trouble, they did not fully comprehend the will of God, sticking to external practices. Southern Poland was contiguous to Turkey. The province of Podolia was, during the seventeenth century, directly under Turkish rule. Jews driven from place to place had an opportunity of coming in contact with brethren in distant lands, though there were no newspapers and no regular mail connections. People of Podolia heard of the Messiah in Smyrna. The stories, when they reached such distant parts, were changed and so shaped as to kindle the hopes. Rumors were current, that Sabbatai Zebi had never converted to Islam, that the whole story was an invention of his enemies, who were an instrument in the hands of Satan, who always finds some ruse to prevent the coming of the Messiah, and in reality the prophet had, like Moses, retired to the wilderness, or returned to heaven, whence, like Moses, he would come back after 40 years. He was due to arrive in 1706, and in order to be on time, a number of enthusiasts from Podolia and Volhynia went to Palestine in 1700. A few days after their arrival Judah the Pious, the leader of the band, died of the plague, and his dupes scattered in all directions, most of them converting to either Islam, Catholicism or Protestantism. Again a Messianic hope had ended in disappointment, but optimists are not easily disillusioned. The masses still continued to believe that through the knowledge of divine mysteries, which only a few select people are privileged to grasp, the nostrum for all the ills of the Jewish people would be found. In Poland, where in addition to the uncertainty of political conditions, the crowding of the masses created indescribable misery, this optimism was stronger than anywhere else. In addition to outside causes, there was a religious motive for this change. Nowhere in the Jewish world was rabbinic learning more general than in Poland. Even there, however, the masses could not have been scholars. They felt that they were neglected. Rabbinic learning turned about the law. Every scholar, who studied the Schulhan Aruk, wrote marginal notes in his copy. It was the greatest ambition to have invented a new "Din." Yet this legalism was bound to leave a void in the hearts of people. You might study a lifetime and still have overlooked some important authority on the question which Haftarah to read, when the 29th of Kislev happened to be a Sabbath. It made one feel good to know all opinions on the subject, but the cobbler, and carrier of burdens, did not derive from such disputations any compensation on Sabbath for his six days of misery and drudgery. He longed for a spiritual uplift, and this was given to him, not by the learned rabbi, who looked upon him with pity and contempt, but by the revivalist, who spoke to him of God and his promises, of a golden age that was soon to be realized, and of a religion that merely needed sympathy, that merely required an echo in our hearts, but no effort of our untrained mind.

Such a man was a certain Israel, a plain teamster in Podolia, whom people called the "Baal Shem" (the miracle worker). Like all founders of religion, he remains in the dusk of history. We know that he was born somewhere in Podolia, about 1695, and he died in Medziboz, May 21, 1760. His first biography, published about fifty years after his death, is full of the wildest, most silly miracles, and can help us little because even in regard to his teachings there are serious contradictions in the various reports. We can only construe his personality by analogy. We know that all through history, people living a solitary life, close to nature, such as shepherds, trappers, and woodmen, are supposed to know secret remedies for all ills. Israel Bescht, as he was afterwards called, the name being an abbreviation of "Baal Shem" Tob, which might be translated, the kindly miracle worker, lived such a lonely life, as was natural for a teamster, hauling his freight through the dense forests of Poland. It may be supposed that he performed some happy cures, and people began to look to him as one gifted with miraculous powers. Religious teachings, and advice to pray and to perform religious rites, always go hand in hand with such miraculous cures. As a man used to solitary life, Israel probably was glad, when after weeks of loneliness he found good company, which he would entertain by singing, and with whom he would enjoy conviviality. Such a religious leader was more sympathetic than the average rabbi, who was barely seen outside of his study, and who never talked of anything except the problems of rabbinic law.

Like every founder of a religion, Israel had his apostles. One of them, hardly much younger than his master, for he died in 1773 as an old man, was Baer of Mezdzyrzec, which for the sake of protecting our jawbones we usually pronounce Mezritch. He must have been a man of some rabbinical learning. He attracted a large number of disciples, some of them men of high standing in the rabbinical world. They all wanted to learn something of the new interpretation of Judaism. What this consisted of is hard to say. From a contemporary witness, Solomon Maimon, who later on became an infidel, we might judge that this teaching was not a systematic instruction, but occasional remarks on Biblical passages, turned and twisted from their original meaning, and applied to the condition of him to whom they were addressed. They were a sort of oracle. People, however, did not come so much for theoretical instruction as they came for learning the ways to serve God. The rabbi during prayer or when performing religious rites went into various eccentric motions, or chanted, sighed, all of which possessed in the eyes of his admirers a mystic force. Rabbi Baer established a dynasty. His school did not lay down any definite teachings, but it seems that they believed the miraculous power, given to certain elect people which enable them to perform miracles, are hereditary. Yet the descendants of Bescht soon disappeared, while the descendants of Rabbi Baer are even now nearly one hundred and fifty years after his death, believed to possess miraculous gifts.

Two generations elapsed without producing a strong type. Rabbi Baer's son and grandson simply seemed to have been made by their admirers, but in the fourth generation a reincarnated saint appeared again. He was named Israel, for the great founder of the new doctrine, and living in Ruzhin, Padolia, he was called by the Hasidim all over the country the "Ryzhiner." In his case we know a little better how a man succeeded in winning admirers. First he stood up against modernism. All attempts of the government and the progressive Jews to promote secular education, to discard Jewish peculiarities in dress, speech, and social habits, were sin, leading to apostasy, and making it forever impossible that Israel shall come into his own. Let us try to give this phrase in Hasidic verbiage. We would say the Shechinah will forever remain in exile. Let us say that all of us need the annihilation of self, the grasp of truth, and furthermore let these expressions be given in Hebrew, so that they have a power as mystic as the name of a drug has when it is given in Latin. Thus we understand the power exercised by these men. Furthermore, there is a suggestive influence in people sitting together, singing and drinking. In all troubles people desire aid and counsel. The saint would say a word like "God will help." Occasionally God would help, and this established His reputation, so that if God did not help the fault lay not with the Saint. Such plain facts would be exaggerated, as is the case everywhere. We can notice it in the reports of Christian Science healers. Such a healer told me that she cured a broken arm by declaring that it would not hurt. We doubt that either the arm was not broken, or she had not healed it, but her disciples believed so.

This Ryzhiner, born about 1775, lived at the time of Nicholas I, when the attempt was made to modernize the Jews. He naturally opposed this most strongly, and was thrown in prison, where he remained for over two years. On the details of this story we are not informed. Contemporary Jewish papers tell us that the government saw in him the cause of the failure to spread secular education. Two Scotch missionaries, who traveled in Galicia and Rumania in those days—to Russia they were not admitted—report that the progressive Jews had brought charges against Rabbi Israel, declaring that he sent large sums of money to Palestine, and that he taught the Jews that smuggling and other methods of defrauding the government were no sin. He was finally dismissed from prison. His admirers say that the minister came personally to his cell and begged him to leave, because in a dream he had a vision that threatened him with most terrible things if he would not give this saint his freedom.

The fact is that Israel was discharged in 1842 and, feeling that in Russia he would never be safe, he went to Turkey, obtained there a passport as a Turkish subject, then went to Austria, settling in the little town of Sadagora, a few miles from Czernowitz, conveniently located for his admirers in Russia, Galicia, Rumania and Hungary, to come to him for advice and blessing. It is one of the practices of these saints to establish their residence in small towns. There they are not observed by the masses, and local authorities are usually glad to enjoy the advantage derived from the numerous pilgrims. He lived there undisturbed until his death, October 19, 1849, being succeeded by his son, Abraham Jacob, who died September 13, 1883, to be succeeded again by his son Israel, who died in the prime of life, October 1, 1906, to be succeeded by a son, Aaron, who died at the age of thirty-six, September 30, 1912, promptly succeeded by a son, Mottel, sixteen years old, who, compelled to flee before the advancing Russian army in 1914, is now in Vienna, subsisting on charity. Thus it seems that the eighth generation will close the history of the dynasty.

AN OUNCE OF EXPERIENCE WORTH A POUND OF THEORY.

By Adolph Brand.

The lodge which does nothing is doing something that had better not be done.

It is sometimes profitable for a lodge to do a thing that does not pay in the beginning.

It is stimulating to find some brethren that have great convictions and the courage of carrying them out, even if they are expensive.

Laymen can often reach candidates whom preachers cannot touch.

Plans have been laid and sermons preached for the purpose of propaganda, but there is nothing like "personal touch."

More can be accomplished by individual efforts than by any other means. The personal word counts for so much more than the word spoken from the platform.

Personal effort is a form of service that no lodge can afford to omit, if it wants to get proper candidates.

Most of the lodges have discovered its value, and all the other lodges ought to make the same helpful discovery—the sooner the better.

Only sincerity can be certain of success. "Sincerity"—you have heard it ten thousand times. Remember that you have heard it because it is ten thousand times truer than that some have succeeded because of popularity or luck.

A committee on new members—what does it do for the worker in the field besides giving him a list of names? (Excepting one lodge.)

We want the whole lodge to be a welcoming committee whose duty shall be to see to it that every brother in the lodge room is ready with the "glad hand" after a candidate is initiated.

We believe in personal and individaul friendliness. All of us should take notice of every new man who comes into our ranks.

We must try our utmost to make every member feel at home with us.

Open-handed and genuine B. B. hospitality is about as valuable a standard of service as any lodge can have.

If through the efforts of any sincere brother the lodge is growing large, all the more is it under obligation to recognize and aid the worker.

If the meetings are uninteresting the members must none the less attend and help to make it bright and attractive, as the lodge is under obligation to itself, to the D. G. L. and to the Order to get together and start something.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Feb. 19, 1917.

The principal business at the last meeting the First Lodge of England was the election of office bearers for the current year. Hitherto the vice-president usually succeeded to the Chair, but on this occasion the present writer, through the great pressure of government work, was unable to accede to the Council's invitation to accept the presidency, and Bro. S. Gilbert was prevailed upon to undertake the position. In Bro. Gilbert the lodge has a president possessing energy and ability and an acquaintance with the community and its needs second to none in London. The lodge looks forward to a successful year under his leadership, a year that may be fraught with many and serious changes. For vice-president the Council chose and the lodge accepted Bro. Alexander Rubens, who is a past treasurer of the lodge, and who at the Council meetings was always listened to for his sound advice. Bro. Henry Wolff is the new treasurer, and if he deals with the finances of the lodge as he has done with those of the Jewish Hospital the lodge may expect to have a very large balance on the right side when the next treasurer succeeds. Bro. Paul Goodman remains honorary general secretary, to everybody's delight, and for honorary foreign secretary the choice of the lodge fell upon Bro. Benjamin Grad. To the new Council the lodge elected Bros. Dr. Buchler, Dr. M. Epstein, I. Landau, Dayan H. M. Lazarus and Julian Levy. Bro. Israel Feldman, from whom the lodge expects great things, is warden, and Bro. S. Wallach, who has already rendered yeoman service in many capacities, is the guardian.

In the main, new men are to the fore, and the lodge may be heartily congratulated on this success. In other communal bodies in this country, as no doubt elsewhere, too, there is a tendency for the "old gang" to run the organizations in which they are interested. The younger men obtain scant opportunities for co-operating. In the case of the First Lodge of England, the spirit and the letter of the constitution are observed in the gradual calling up of newer members to help in the work of leadership. At the same time. the older members of the lodge continue to show their old interest, and are ever ready to bring their experience and riper judgments to the assistance of the lodge. The prevailing system not only arouses the interest of the individual member in the activities and the standing of the lodge, but is at the same time a training in public work.

At its last meeting the lodge gave some consideration to the reply of the allied powers to President Wilson's note, and unanimously agreed to adopt the following resolution, copies of which have been sent to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs:

> "That the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith (Sons of the Covenant), First Lodge of England, consisting of public workers in the Anglo-Jewish community, respectfully welcomes the declaration made by the Allies, in their reply to the President of the United States, to the effect that their aims imply 'the reorganization of Europe . . . based at once on respect for nationalities and on the right to full security and liberty of economic development possessed by all peoples, small and great'; that it regards this as a charter of rights for Jews and all other oppressed peoples; and that it desires to convey to the British Government its heartfelt appreciation of same".

It is to be hoped that other Jewish bodies, not only in our own country, but also in neutral countries, will follow the lead of the London lodge. The pronouncement of the Allies is, as it were, a Magna Charta for all oppressed peoples, whether Jews or Armenians, Czechs or Ruthenians; and those Jews in America who have been inclined to be unfriendly to the Allies' cause because of Russia, should not overlook the fact, first, that the declaration referred to binds all the Allies, and, secondly, that hostile countries have not been able to make a similar declaration.

In this country at the present time both the Poles and the Czechs maintain special bodies to keep their respective hopes and claims before public opinion. The Polish Committee, like the Czech Committee, issues literature, arranges for lectures and keeps the press posted, all with a view to keeping alive their expectation of a rejuvenated Poland and Bohemia, respectively. Up till quite recently nothing of the same kind was attempted for Palestine and the Jews. At length a British Palestine Committee has been formed in Manchester, mainly of non-Jews, to urge upon the British Government the importance of including Palestine within the British Empire when the peace settlement is made, and of giving every facility for encouragement to the development in Palestine of a Jewish national life. This movement recalls the work of pioneers like Lawrence Oliphant, who wanted to see a Jewish Palestine as an integral portion of the British Empire. We believe that such a demand would find a re-echo in the hearts of the great mass of Jews who are oppressed in Russia, in Galicia, in Roumania, to say nothing of the educated Jews of Western Europe and America who understand the true inwardness of the British Empire as a free democratic entity, strong enough and wise enough to hold many creeds and races within itself. If there is room for the hundreds of specifically different types of India, if there is room for the Boer and the Frenchman, the Arab and the Chinese, why should there not be room for the Jew? The Jew's worst enemies admit that he has within him in large measure the stuff of which the best citizen is made. Let him, therefore, have a chance to show what he can do politically, even as the Albanian, Montenegrin and Serbian has had his chance.

There is another aspect to this question. After the war the resources of the British Empire will have to be utilized and consolidated. The old prejudices of the past will have gone to the limbo of forgotten things. As an indication of the new awakening, let us but record the fact, the eloquent fact, that India is to be represented at the Imperial Council. That clearly shows that past prejudices have disappeared and the Empire is going to be regarded as a whole, and all its resources will be developed. But resources alone are of no avail without men. Hence all the best powers in the Empire, be they given to white or brown men, to Aryans or Semites, will be harmoniously blended for the benefit of the whole body politic. Therein lies the hope of the Jew. Ever ready to give his gifts to his country, the Jew is only waiting the opportunity to co-operate with his fellow citizens for the welfare of the state. No less a man than the late Lord Cromer, who was a great builder of Empires, was in favor of a Jewish Palestine.

Curiously enough, the Palestine movement referred to coincides with a change that has come over organized Zionism in this country. The internal affairs of the English Zionist Federation have fallen into other hands. English Zionists have been split into two camps; the one may roughly be termed the practical Zionists, the other the intellectuals. The former carried the day for a long time, and the latter rather took up a hostile attitude. At the last conference of the English Zionists, held in London, a compromise between the two sections was arrived at, and the new Council is composed of both elements, determined to work amicably together. Dr. Ch. Weizmann, who, it may be mentioned incidentally, has done some very remarkable war work in chemical research for the government, is the new president, and people in a position to judge are agreed that he is the best man for the post. Under his guidance Zionism in England may expect to do really good work on a large scale and cease from petty bickerings.

In the general Jewish community two schemes are being discussed which augur exceedingly well for the future. The first is a large endowment for religious education. The country as a whole is awakening to the need of providing better education for its citizens; and in the Anglo-Jewry the same opinion has been growing for a decade or two. When the state decides to improve the educational system of the country, the state can draw on public money for the purpose. The state in England is indeed about to do so. But when a private body attempts to improve education it is very often deterred by lack of means. Over and over again has the absolute need of more religious education been insisted upon in Anglo-Jewry. We have board and councils and committees on the subject, and the reports that come in all agree that there is much room for improvement. The problem is vital, more vital than any other, and its solution will necessitate the outlay of money. To obtain this money is the scheme that is now debated. A large sum is contemplated. Someone has advised the people concerned to be bold and think in hundreds of thousands, and the Chief Rabbi may have to constitute himself Chief Beggar for the purpose. At present it is a suggestion. But in the midst of apathy a spark like this is worth much. The scheme, if ever it is carried out, will meet with great understanding and much sympathy in every quarter.

The other scheme alluded to above is likewise dependent on finance. It is one of the vagaries of the war that it threatens to dry up the supply of copies of the Talmud for the greater part of Europe. As is generally known, Wilna is the great center for printing the Talmud, and Wilna in more peaceful days supplied the world. Today Wilna is in German occupation. It is therefore technical enemy territory, and allied countries are precluded from dealing with it. But apart from this, it is doubtful whether the printing presses are still in existence. Wilna was a long time in the war zone, and weapons of war respect neither men nor printing presses. Accordingly, as there is a shortage of copies of the Talmud in England, a suggestion has been made to print an English, which means in effect a London, edition. The scheme has something grand about it. It would at any rate be a permanent monument to the war to have an edition of the Talmud with London on the title-page. Prayer books we print ourselves. Of Hebrew Bibles we have an abundance, thanks to the efforts of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Why not then an English Talmud? Some bold spirits have taken counsel together and are considering ways and means. To reprint the twenty odd tomes will cost a small fortune. How get that fortune together? A Maecenas might indeed come forward and have the special edition called by his name. Some men are immortalized in marble, some in verse; why not in the twentieth century, immortalization through the Talmud? But Maecenases at all times are rare; and most rare now. So there is nothing for it but to collect twenty thousand subscribers at ten pounds (say 40 dollars) each. That, too, appears a little distant. Still it is something to have had the idea broached. Possibly the future may bring it realization.

Last month Anglo-Jewry recalled an historic event of great significance. Seventy-five years ago, on the 27th of January, 1842, the first Reform Synagogue was consecrated. In more peaceful days there would have been great rejoicings; in the serious circumstances of the time the event was celebrated only by a sermon. The three-quarters of a century that have passed since reform first started have witnessed and produced many changes in English Jewry. For one thing, the breach between the two sections of the community has steadily grown smaller, until today it may safely be asserted that it is healed completely. The two wings of English Jews work together in every good cause, and if the people at Berkeley Street prefer an organ, some synagogues in the United Synagogue Trust who desire an organ and cannot have it, are merely envious. But the healing of breaches in social organisms, the greater co-operation between men of differing views, are undoubtedly facts that matter in human life. The Reform Jew and the Orthodox Jew today lay more stress on the second word in the label than on the first. That, indeed, is the ideal of the Jew, who looks more to that which binds than to that which severs, to our common humanity rather than to the national variations; in a word, to the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

THE IRONY OF JUSTICE

By Stanley Bero, Manager Central Relief Committee

AUTHOR'S NOTE: "The Irony of Justice" was originally written for the purpose of introducing on the screen and thus visualizing for the public the misery and suffering of the Jew in the War Zone. It was hoped that in this way a considerable sum of money would be raised. Unfortunately, the Central Relief Committee has not sufficient means for its production and is, therefore, attempting to portray in a vital fashion in story form the story of the tragedy enacted in Europe. If the story reaches your heart, all we ask is that you be not contented with the mere receipt of profound emotions, but do the more effective thing and send your check for an amount equal with your means to Mr. Harry Fischel, Treasurer of the Central Relief Committee, 63 Park Row, New York City.

Let us journey back to our home in the little Russian Poland town from which we hail. Can you not recall the busy market place, the great big house of the "Poritz"? The Beth Hamedrash, the new Synagogue. Yes, indeed, the old town still remains unchanged in type. One may still see the shopkeepers standing in the doorway awaiting their customers, passing the time between sales, and discussing the latest reports from Warsaw. On the lawns may be seen groups of women, who have gathered together to discuss the significance of a comet which had been seen in those parts the previous night. "What does it mean?" they query. "The Messiah is coming," says one. "Oh, no," says another, "it is a forewarning of the plague." A little old woman in the crowd, irritated at the speculation, ventures in a tragic note to express that it is nothing more nor less than WAR, cruel WAR.

All are excited save some school boys, who in molesting a mad calf find that the calf has in turn decided upon vengeance. They rush through the street, crying at the top of their voices: "Mad dog, mad dog." But not even the cries of mad dog, or the sight of a vicious calf in pursuit of the boys could disturb the village folk in their revery and discussions over the war and its attending misery. While gripped by the great necessity which follows in the wake of war, a light of hope seems suddenly to have entered upon the minds of the miserable inhabitants. "There is America," one says, "surely they will not forget the town of Zlidouwka in its trials."

The sun is beginning to set in a sky red with the impending doom. The working men and working women are returning from their day's labor, anxious to partake of a frugal but satisfying meal. All is quiet, as if something was hanging over the entire town and was about to fall at any moment. All is quiet, save for the light laughter of two lovely girls, who, oblivious of pain or impending sorrow, walk hand in hand through the fields of fragrance, youthful and happy. Rivala, the taller one of the two, is the daughter of a Rabbi, while the other, Debora, is in a very worthwhile sense the village belle.

Suddenly there is a cessation of this rippling laughter of youth. The two girls have become conscious to a man's presence behind them and grip each other's hands in fear that harm is about to befall them. To run now is their only salvation, so they commenced running. They stop, however, when they find that the man who has been following them is Gabriel, a very much liked youth and the brother of Debora. There is an affectionate greeting between the elder brother and his little sister, Debora, and one of subtility between Rivala and Gabriel.

It is necessary to look back a little into the lives of Gabriel and Debora and examine casually the trials and tribulations to which they have ever been heir. In the horrible massacre of Kisheneff, Gabriel's mother and father gave up their lives in order that he and Debora, their children, might live on. After the reign of blood and terror had subsided the two found themselves orphans, with the world of struggle before them. However, through the kindness of some friends in America and some institutional aid extended to them, they scarcely managed to live through the hateful years which followed. Now they were grown up, and a sweeter or more charming pair could not be found anywhere in the community. As children, and now as grown-ups, they were constantly in each other's company. When the inevitable happened and Gabriel, grown to manhood, became anxious to enter upon the world's work, it was no more than natural that he should wish to take his sister with him wherever he should be called to go. Fortunately, he soon found a secretaryship with a well known firm established in Besserabia. To Besserabia both Gabriel and Debora went.

They took up their home in the new town, but it was not to be long before the beloved young man and his sister should be asked to the homes of those who stood well in the city of their adoption. Among these hosts of the pair was the Rabbi of the town, the father of Rivala.

Rivala and Dobera found a mutual opportunity for the development of a friendship of an everlasting nature. While in the heart of Gabriel there was born that supreme passion of the ages which we are wont to look upon and to characterize as love. Of course, it was the charming and delightful Rivala who was the subject of Gabriel's profound devotion.

To return to our trio of friends, whom we have left engaged in a merry meeting on the road, absorbed in each other as youth only can be, oblivious of time and distance, they suddenly become conscious of the fact that they have wandered far beyond the city limits and are within hearing and speaking distance of the military barracks. A sentinel, with

PASSOVER REFLECTIONS.

We are once more on the eve of Passover. The "Jewish Eve of Passover" has a character too well known to every Jew who has lived himself through ghetto conditions, or at least has heard of them from father or mother. Those were indeed mother's most busy weeks, a season of house cleaning, of turning the leaven out and bringing in the "bread of affliction". The muddy streets and alleys come to one's mind, as the wintery snow melted away by the touch of the spring sun; the open windows letting in air, the floors scrubbed, the pots and pans scoured, the flour taken to the baker and the unleavened cakes secreted; then the very last day preceding the festival when the remains of the leaven were burned, new glassware submerged in running stream water, when in the afternoon mother set the table and father rehearsed the tractate Passover, telling of the ancient ceremonial at the Temple of bygone days, all culminating in the crowning event of the evening, when cares were forgotten, when the clean house and the spotless table linen and the lights kindled all combined to create that atmosphere of freedom—all these memories are ineradicable. Religion without ceremonies is unthinkable. Life itself is made up of trifles. The small things encompass the greater thoughts, they are their garb and vesture. From time to time we grow impatient of the ceremonials and would rest content with the central lessons. But there cannot be a center without a periphery. The graver things of the law must be founded in the lesser. The soul needs the body to dwell in. Disembodied souls are ghostly. They belong to another sphere and habitat. Here on earth there is no room for such denizens.

Religion, moreover, is bound up with the dramatic instinct. The Jewish service is intensely dramatic. Where it has been shorn of its old-time forms and is reduced to lyric declamation, it remains sober, sterile. It lifts not the soul to the regions on high. It soars not aloft above the things humdrum. On Seder night we enact the exodus. Children are thrilled. The elders narrate, and the narrative so often repeated keeps a fresh charm. And what do we narrate? The events of a far past, which, alas, have repeated themselves through the centuries. We have been enslaved by more than one Pharaoh. We have had more than one exodus. Jewish centers have been constantly shifting. No sooner had we settled down to peace when ruthlessly persecution broke [illegible] and the weary wanderer was [illegible] to move on. We would fain give [illegible] to the joy of freedom which [illegible] the great land of the free. But [illegible] of the sufferings of our brethren in the lands of persecution will not down. Our joy is tempered with the contemplation in mind of the woes of the Jew in certain of the belligerent countries. Still we lose not faith, the faith in humanity. Better days surely will come. Slavery in all its forms must cease some time. Next year, we hope, shall find us all free, the Jew abroad as well.

Passover is a festival of hoary antiquity. It takes us back to the days when our forefathers dwelt securely in their own land, each under his vine and fig tree. The night when the festival was sanctified was one of merriment, of song, of joy. The husbandman had brought in his first sheaf. He brought it to the altar. He gave himself over to sweet reminiscences. He told the young generation of the great deeds of the past. For Passover was the nation's birthday. It was the day upon which Israel followed the Lord into an unknown future. But there was with it the enthusiasm of utter devotion, of trusting love. Those were the halcyon days of youthful affection. The whole nation gave itself then over to an idea. And that idea was centered in the love of liberty and in the love of God. The simplest-minded and the most humble saw the vision of the bared arm which wrought marvelous things. Israel consecrated himself to the ideal of redemption. He did not hoard the ideal, putting it away for his own use only. He was lavish with his treasure. Humanity was not ripe for it. He cherished it against the day when all mankind might share it with him. Time and again it seemed as if the day was near at hand. And again and again disenchantment followed. It was so when the daughter religion separated and placed itself upon the pedestal of the sons of Abraham. Israel was content to suffer and bide his time. No great boon comes into this world without the throes of suffering. And so it was again in the past century when for a moment Israel was intoxicated with the new message of a united humanity. In the wake of liberalism came only ugly visage of anti-semitism. It had been a dream, that thought that the era of final redemption had come. The end of the days is not yet in sight. What we see before us is utter devastation wrought by mighty engines of war. The nations of the world are farther apart than they have ever been. Elemental brutality has been let loose. Hatred has been engendered, deep-seated, pernicious. But still Israel sings the song of redemption. Still the synagogue resounds with the ancient cry that redemption must come to a world held in the bonds of misery. The winter of desolation is upon us. Yet Israel hopes for the spring of love. It will come, though it tarry. Mankind will regain its lost paradise of innocency. Israel and humanity will be free. Then indeed will be celebrated the Passover of the future. Its joy shall be linked to the Passover of Egypt. Israel's career alone is of unbroken continuity. The fresh evils may make the old sufferings forgotten. But the new joys shall be intertwined with those of the past. Fallen, fallen is Babylon, the extractress of the nations! So shall humanity jubilantly sing with Israel. And a kingdom shall be established in love and justice. Nations shall not war upon another. And within the nations themselves there shall not be the cry of subjugation. For all of God's children shall be free. Against that day let us hold ourselves intact. For that day shall we live. And in the continued existence of the Jew there shall come to mankind the assurance that its salvation was of the Jew, the Jew that in loyalty to his ideal kept the faith. On our shoulders has been cast the burden of humanity. Though the earth totter, we stand steadfast. We are freedom's children, freedom's consecrated servant.

SENTIMENTALISM IN RELIGION.

That the world war which is upon us should have caused among those who have borne the brunt of religious questionings is not surprising at all. Though we may tomorrow ourselves take a part in it, so far it has not come home to us at all, we have heard of it only by hearsay. Millions of men have perished or are maimed. There is the pall of mourning all over Europe. Heartrending experiences have come to many a parent or wife or sweetheart. It is true that a common misfortune is more easily borne. But nevertheless the loss of one's offspring, even though it occur on the field of honor for one's country, is a severe blow to the survivors. We can readily understand that doubts arise as to the necessity of it all. Where is the God of justice and compassion? men will be found to query. And if perchance there is to come out of it all a beneficent result, are the sacrifices at all commensurate with the untold sufferings? Must such carnage be the means whereby God's purposes are accomplished?

Mr. Wells, the novelist, has found a new theology. The old "Jew-God" does not suit him in the least. That, of course, is a bit of anti-Semitism, on a level with his denominating the Treaty of Berlin a "Jew-German arrangement". Jews and Germans, anyway, seem to be synonymous in the mind of many an Englishman just now. It is not true a bit. German Jews have stood by their country as was their bounden duty. And so have the Jews fought heroically in all the other countries engaged in this bloody business. Lissauer penned the Hymn of Hatred as a German, not as a Jew, which by the way he is not, for he was baptized. Serious thinkers in England have long ago repudiated their countryman Houston Stewart Chamberlain and his philosophies of race persistence. Race is a factor, but nationality and culture are a far more preponderating influence. We Jews are accustomed to being charged with being the cause of all the calamities that befall mankind. If the plague kills humanity by the thousands, it is the Jew who has poisoned the wells. If the great powers fall out among themselves, we Jews are the cause. And if the English or French or German or Russian youth is exterminated by the millions it is the fault of the "Jew God".

"Jew-God" is, of course, a blasphemous appellation. We Jews acknowledge no special God. Our God is God, the Only One. There is none beside Him. They call Christianity the religion of peace and good-will. The gospel is supposed to inculcate non-resistance. Yet Christians are engaged in a terrible struggle which is born of greed and lust and covetousness. It shows what it means to be sentimental in religion. The founder long ago counselled giving unto God what is God's and unto Caesar what is Caesar's. So God reigns on Sundays and Caesar during the rest of the week. In the churches they sing hymns of peace and abroad the sword is unsheathed. If the Christian finds consolation in the thoughts that it is not man only who suffers, but that the crucified God suffers along with him, it is not our province to cavil. For that matter the rabbis assert that our stern "Jew-God" sympathizes with the suffering of the meanest criminal on the gallows. "Oh, my head! oh, my arms." Still we are far from humanizing the Deity. For the old "Jew-God" after all was close to the realities of things. The pious Jew resigns himself to God's will and God's ways though they be past the human understanding. It is ingrained in us that God's ways are not our ways. We doubt not that His government of the world is for beneficent ends. That He chooses to chasten humanity through feuds and carnage and sin may seem cruel only to the short-sighted. A deep-seated malady cannot be cured by sugared pills. Radical ills require radical measures. The cancer must be cut out by the knife. Yes, let men ask themselves whether religion has been a serious business with them all along before they lay their squabbles at the door of religion. Had the commandments of God been obeyed there would have been no war. "Thou shalt not covet, thou shalt not remove landmarks." Were these commandments heeded?

Yes, the Lord is the God of battles. And with Him alone are the issues. He makes us suffer, when suffering alone will turn us to Him, to the eternal verities. He makes the kingdoms to totter, He causes warfare and death. But He knows that only through the portals of agony may we enter into the bliss of life. God is good. The evil is of our own making largely. He has not created us as automata. If the evil impulse is implanted within us, the good inclination dwells right by. Through the evil to the good, through suffering to surcease, through death to life, these are the ways of God that He may lead mankind to ever higher stages. He has placed us in a world of stern realities. But it is His will and purpose that we shall emerge to behold the gentle ideals. The frost of winter is His, but so is the sunshine of spring. And a universe all of sunshine and spring may suit the sentimentalist, but it might prove a bit too monotonous for common humanity. The sturdy among us will put their trust in the stern vindicator of right, and with pious resignation accept the evil as well as the good at the hands of providence.

of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews' Congregations.
"Mizpah" 193 Maida Vale.

London, Jan. 23, 5677, 1917.

My Dear Grand President Kraus:

I have read with great pleasure from the news which have just trickled through of the grand stand which you have taken in the Council of the Jewish nation. By your attitude, by your wisdom, and by your personal example you have made it possible for the best elements in American Jewry to gather around the true principle of emancipation for our people and for the freedom of the masses, the suffering, the toiling, the poor and the downtrodden. If the voice of American Jewry is to be heard in the future Congress of Peace, I am glad to think that by your timely and spirited intervention you have helped the true voice of Israel to ring out free and not muffled, and that your efforts may lead to the only result possible—a lasting peace also for our people.

I have just read with admiration the wonderful speech of President Wilson, the great outlook which is thereby opened for the future of mankind, and the hope that is therein expressed that in the future every nation will be able to take its place and its share in the great work of human progress, human justice and human liberty. It must be a source of profound satisfaction to every lover of our people to know that the congress of Jews whenever it meets will re-echo the same sentiments and will work in unison for the realization of the same ideals, helped, assisted and inspired by your action, and guided by your ripe wisdom and love for our people.

Believe me to remain, dear Mr. Kraus,
Yours sincerely,
M. GASTER.

FERDINAND LABORI.

Ferdinand Labori, who was attorney for Capt. Alfred Dreyfus, died on March 14, after a long and painful illness.

Ferdinand Labori, long prominent at the Paris bar, sprang into international prominence as the result of his activities in the celebrated Dreyfus case in the late '90s.

A conspicuous service in this connection was performed by him in behalf of Emile Zola, when that noted author was accused of libeling the French president and the French army in his defense of Capt. Dreyfus. Later Maitre Labori acted as the defender of Dreyfus at the treason trial at Rennes.

"MERCHANT OF VENICE" ELIMINATED FROM MINNEAPOLIS SCHOOLS.

As a result of the efforts of Director Henry Deutsch, the Board of Education of Minneapolis passed a resolution eliminating the "Merchant of Venice" from the school curriculum.

NEWS FROM BERLIN

By Ex-President Dr. T. Elbogen (Berthold Auerbach Lodge, Berlin)

Berlin, March, 1916.

About a year has elapsed since the Hospital Train which the German Lodges presented to the German Army was completed. When accompanied by District President Timendorfer, she made her first journey to the front, many believing the war would soon be over, thought it hardly worth while setting her in motion. But the war is still going on, and the Hospital Train has already taken her twenty-fifth journey. She has brought thousands of wounded soldiers relief and comfort, and saved many from certain death. It is touching to see what deep interest the lodges of our district take in the Hospital Train. Again and again she is supplied with all that is necessary, with all kinds of presents for the soldiers in the front, the Sister Lodges being most prominent in these works of love, and whenever the train stops at a residence of a Lodge, the members not only consider it their duty, but a special honor to replenish her with all that is wanting. So the train always arrives at the front laden with gifts, warming the hearts of the recipients, ever and anon offering the many wounded men the possibility of being treated in a clinic in their fatherland.

And what a wide field for work has the Jewish Field Minister! How lovingly he cares for our soldiers—for the healthy, sick and dead. His admission is a new institution in this war. Even in 1870 a Jewish Minister was only appointed with great difficulty, and when at last he got to the front, he scarcely had the opportunity of doing anything. But when this campaign began, at the request of the "Verband der Deutschen Juden," the Prussian Minister of War allowed a minister to be appointed for the Jewish soldiers. At first several Rabbis went out with the troops, but their numbers have continually increased, till at present there are seventeen Rabbis ministering to the Jewish men in the field, and ultimately one has been appointed to the Navy. These eighteen are assisted by other Rabbis, who are stationed near the front.

The functions of these ministers are many fold. They hold regular services, they try to animate the troops for an hour or so with cheerful conversation. They also in many cases keep up the intercourse between the soldiers and their relatives by sending them news of their loved ones, especially of the wounded soldiers they find in the Military Hospitals. These Hospital visits form an important part of their functions. It goes without saying that they also visit wounded soldiers of other confessions, looking after their wants and making them presents. They are called to the funerals of fallen soldiers, too. The Jewish soldier considers the presence of the Field Ministers to be a special blessing, for they not only bring him the consolation of religion, for which he feels great necessity in the hard time, but they are for him, at least for a few hours, a portion of home and peace. Moreover the presence and work of the Jewish Field Minister has become very important, because for the first time the Superior Military Staff of Command and the Field Ministers of other confessions are constantly in touch with the Rabbis, and consequently learn to value their personalities and their work. In recognition of their self-sacrificing and blessed work the majority of the Rabbis have been presented with the Iron Cross, and while this is being written the papers report that during the discussion on Ecclesiastical Returns in the Budget Committee of the Prussian Landtag, an orthodox Protestant Field Clergyman, Deputy of the extreme Conservative Party, said he very highly prizes the work of the Jewish Rabbis in the field. The exertions of the Jewish Rabbis, which are exceedingly great, are increased by much necessary traveling. They are on the best of terms with the Field Ministers of other confessions. This opportunity of personal connection and joint work for a long and so eventful a period without question, in certain respects, is a good outlook for the future. We can presume that herefrom in wide circles of the Christian clergy, and political authoritative circles, the Jewish religion and its representatives will be better understood and appreciated and the progress will have been made towards getting equal rights for the Jews.

In fact, an important political victory has been gained in this direction. By a unanimous resolution of the "Reichstag," the "Reichskanzler" has been requested to grant the Jewish Field Ministers the same compensation as the clergymen of other confessions with no fixed appointments. The Bundesrat has seconded this resolution, and thus the Jewish religion has been recognized as a religion for the first time here, and this has already brought fresh concessions with it.

The Field Ministers have a similar recognition and position only in the allied Austria-Hungary. In France and Italy, where they are also admitted, a like appointment is impossible on account of conditions between Religion and State. Also in England, as far as we know, the recognition and the work of the Jewish Ministers are on quite a different scale, but at present we are not in a position to get trustworthy information and therefore say no more on this point.

We are quite aware that these small concessions do not put an end to our struggle for our rights; we know we have very much more to do and are well aware that the anti-semites are trying their best to make the position of the Jews worse after the war. We know we shall have to continue the struggle which has been forced upon us; the organizations which have been working to secure equal rights for the Jews will have to continue their efforts in future with redoubled energy—will have to work and watch. But it is equally clear to us that in this struggle we can get no aid from abroad, that any advice from thence, however well meant it may be, will rather injure than assist us. We have every civil and political right and are in the position to have our wishes and complaints brought before the highest officials. Help from abroad cannot serve us for we alone are in a position to clearly understand the situation; foreigners sometimes get very wrong ideas.

Such a phantom is that of the slighting of the Jews in the Universities, it being made to appear that in Germany, or at least in Prussia, the Jews are not admitted as Professors in Ordinary in the Universities. My dear friend, Dr. Epstein, formerly had a better memory; he surely cannot have forgotten that in Breslau, where he studied, and in Heidelberg, where he doctored, a large number of Jews were Professors in Ordinary. It is true that in Berlin at the time Dr. Epstein was in the University, there were no Jews there as Professors in Ordinary, because for a long time the principle was not to appoint Jews as such, but some years before the war this principle was set aside, and several Jews have also been admitted in Berlin as Professors in Ordinary in the University, and as members in Ordinary in the Academy of Sciences. How little outsiders are in the position to judge of the conditions here can be observed in the case of Professor Barth which has been so fully discussed.

Barth was a Semitic Philologer of world-wide reputation, who nevertheless died a Professor in Extraordinary; but it was just Barth who was several times called as a Professor in Ordinary, and who refused because he had no desire to leave the capital and to give up his work in the Orthodox Rabbi Seminary of Berlin, where a professorship which could have been offered to Barth was not vacant at that time. Similar cases where it appears that Jews have not been promoted, when really they have refused to accept the offer for personal reasons are of frequent occurrence, though they seldom come under public notice.

Still it cannot be denied that there are positions which the Jews are exempted from filling—now and in the future. But to be candid we must not suppress the question: Where is there a country in which the Jews have not to suffer for some slight or other, not to speak of their sometimes having to endure excesses of the worst kind? Even today and with regard to "democratic" countrties, we can say with Lessing: "All are not free who laugh at their chains".

The struggle for the equal rights for the Jews is a part of the inward political struggle that we in Germany have to fight out. Every country has its own inward political struggles; each has its own ends in view, and it is difficult to judge in what country the conjoint amount of freedom and equality is greater, but we in Germany, in spite of all defamation, are of the opinion that the constitution of the German Empire can compete with any in Europe. Our struggle for equal rights for the Jews in Germany is of course influenced by the special religious conditions that exist in Germany. As the Church and State work together here, a full emancipation of the Jews cannot be attained by some individual being admitted to a superior position, but by the Jewish religion being recognized as such, this not being the case in any leading state, Austria-Hungary excepted. With respect to this, we refer to a very important movement going on here at present. For some years several professors of Protestant Theology have, for reasons of equality, been proposing that a Faculty for Jewish Theology in a Prussian University should be set up. In the January number of the "Der Neue Merkur," Professor Stark in Jena in an article on "Judaism as a Scientific Problem," recognizing the very valuable work Jewish scholars have done by their scientific researches and descriptions of Judaism, has requested that at length a place should be created in a University for the researches of the science. In this article is especially interesting the author's remark "that a number of men in academical offices during the inquietude of the Universal War have pleaded to the Prussian Minister of Education, to set up a faculty for Jewish science".

Professor Stark, who has long been a champion of this idea, has no doubt that this request will be fulfilled by the Government and that ere long it will also place the means at the disposal of this scientific scheme. In fact the Minister of Education in the aforementioned sitting of the parliament mentioned the proposition which was lying before him; but we must wait and see what the result will be. However, so much is certain that Judaism as such has in the last few years gained quite a different position and consideration to that of twenty years ago, and we cannot with justice say that this has not been brought about by the merits of the Jews themselves. Naturally we must not allow this recognition to encourage us to discontinue our work; on the contrary, it must spur us on to further efforts, so that we may continue to progress in the right direction. Germany has so deeply influenced the Judaism of modern times that our honor demands us to maintain and keep this important position which we have inherited from our fathers.

DANGEROUS RESOLUTION PASSED BY POLISH CLUB.

The following resolution was recently adopted by the Polish Club of the Austrian Reichsrath, which comprises all the Polish members for Galicia: "While it is far from the intention of the Polish Club to suggest an anti-semitic policy to the Austrian Government, it is, however, of the opinion that no change of the present order as created by Russia should be introduced in Poland. The Polish population, which is accustomed to the cruel treatment of the Jews, would consider a change of present conditions as a friendly act towards the Jews, and thus, when making a comparison with former conditions, would consider Austrian rule unfriendly. And this could be used by the anti-Semites as a pretext for instigating pogroms."

TESTIMONIAL DINNER TO JUDGE ABRAHAM K. COHEN.

Massachusetts Lodge No. 27 of Boston tendered a banquet to its honored and distinguished brother, Judge Abraham K. Cohen, the outgoing president of the district. A number of out-of-town brothers were present, among whom were Bro. Charles Hartman of New York, member of the Executive Committee; Bro. Harry Cutler of Providence, Bro. A. M. Hillman of Worcester, Bro. Henry Lasker of Springfield, and Bro. Leon Silbert of Amos Lodge of Boston. Others who participated in the program were Bro. Rabbi Harry Lewis of Temple Israel of Boston, Hon. Thomas H. Dowd, Judge of the Municipal Court of Boston, and Bro. Franklin M. Cohen, who acted as toastmaster. The lodge presented Judge Cohen with a beautiful marble pedestal. Bro. Cohen, in his usual dignified and earnest manner, thanked the brothers for the honor and assured them of his continued interest in B. B. work. The officers of Massachusetts Lodge for the year 1917 are: J. Wasserman, president; Franklin M. Cohen, vice-president; Gabriel Sanger, treasurer; J. S. Phillips, secretary. The lodge also presented on this occasion a silver mounted walking cane to Bro. Richard Herrman, the retiring president of Massachusetts Lodge, who was largely instrumental in increasing the membership of Massachusetts Lodge during the past year. A feature of the evening was some choral singing led by Sumner S. Gordon.

RESULT OF PREJUDICE.

A Jewish officer in England, Lieutenant Theodore Beit, committed suicide because his fellow officers treated him badly. He was the son of Alfred Beit, the well-known diamond magnate who gained his riches from the diamond fields in South Africa. Alfred Beit, though a German Jew, was, nevertheless, a personal friend of the Empire builder, Cecil Rhodes, and, like many other German Jews, helped the Englishman build up South Africa and Rhodesia.

a lewd smile, having spied them sends the word along, and the news is caught up by an officer, who makes his way toward them, showering dubious compliments upon Rivala. He grows more and more obnoxious as the trio reproach him for his lewd compliments. At last he grips the hands of Rivala and, kissing them passionately, attempts to make off with her. At this instance, Gabriel showers blows upon him, throws him to the ground and makes for the city limits with his charges.

The anxiety of the village folk was not in vain, for within the twenty-four hours war is declared. Of course, with the declaration of war, the grip of the Russian on the sons of Israel is intensified. Accused of espionage and crimes of varied nature uncommitted by the Jews, they are arrested and imprisoned. It is not surprising to find among the victims of the Russian intrigue, Gabriel.

In the jail the prisoners are huddled together like swine in the pig-pen and treated abominably. Gabriel, of course, is picked out for special punishment by the officer upon whom he had used his manly strength.

After Gabriel's incarceration for several weeks, his friend, the Rabbi, is dragged from the Synagogue, and he, too, upon some unheard of and unbelievable pretext is about to be arrested.

The satanic Lieutenant, who has sworn vengeance on Gabriel, has now thought of a new plan of revenge. The prisons are overcrowded, there is really no room for any more; he therefore suggests to the populace, frantic over the thought that their Rabbi is to be incarcerated, that he will free all the prisoners at the jail if the Rabbi and ten prominent Jewish citizens decide to become victims of the Lieutenant's fury instead.

The Rabbi, feeling that his life should always be dedicated to the happiness of the greatest number, consents to accompany ten leading citizens to the jail and be incarcerated therein. The entire village follows them.

The village is in a state of mourning and sorrow, when the order is given for them to move from their houses so that their property may be burned to the ground. A German attack is expected within the next few hours. Lieutenant Vaseslowitch decides to direct the work in person, and, incidentally, to pursue his licentious plan of capturing Rivala and Debora and using them for his malicious purpose.

He has searched the town in vain for several hours until, finally, his search is rewarded with the capture of the two girls in a cave in which a group of Jews have taken refuge. He succeeds in carrying them off, in spite of the brave effort made by some of the men folks, when Gabriel, armed with a revolver, finds the group of Jews who inform him of the tragedy. He loses no time in his pursual of the Lieutenant and succeeds in regaining the two unfortunate girls.

The Rabbi, broken in spirit by his long incarceration, is taken to his father's, and is now free from the anguish and pain inflicted by the Russian autocracy. Gabriel voluntarily joins the Russian forces, while Debora and Rivala, ever humane and kind, are now in the ranks of the Red Cross nurses.

On the eve of a day of hard fighting, a man is brought in with his arms shattered and his legs nearly torn away. He is dying. A hospital cot is prepared for his comfort. Rivala is asked to take charge of him. In the excitement of preparing the cot for a suffering human being she fails to recognize the man wounded and dying, who is making every effort to whisper something to her. She is about to put a pillow beneath his head when she is startled by the following words, spoken almost in an inaudible whisper: "Madamoiselle, do you not recognize me? I am Vasselovitch. I have been cruel to you and your kind. I crave forgiveness." Riavla is taken back a bit, but not for long. She takes his hand and seeks to comfort him. "Yes." she says, "I hope you will be well soon. I will help you all I can. I forgive you. God teaches his lessons in many ways; out of the knowledge of pain we are elevated into the realms of kindness and good-will to man."

REFUGEES IN PITIABLE CONDITION.

The Jewish Central Committee for the relief of war sufferers in Russia sent a special investigator to Homel to obtain authentic information over the condition of refugees there.

The government is no longer extending any aid to the Jewish Relief Committee in that quarter, and refugees are still being housed in synagogues, public baths and homes.

THOUGHTS AND TIDINGS

Review of Passing Events

By H. ELIASSOF

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

A Jew as Diplomat in Poland in the Sixteenth Century.

The traditional stories of Queen Esterka, who shared the throne of Poland with King Casimir the Great, in the Thirteenth Century, and of Saul Wahl, who was King of Poland for a short time in the Sixteenth Century, have often been told and the reading public is quite familiar with them. But the story that there was a Jew as diplomat in Poland at about the same time Saul Wahl occupied the Polish throne, is not so well known. It will, therefore, be of interest to the readers of the "News" to learn something about this man who was a power in the diplomatic world of his time, especially now when Germany and Austria have restored its independence to Poland and have granted religious autonomy to the Polish Jews.

The name of this Jewish diplomat was Solomon Ben Nathan Ashkenazi. He was born in Udine, Venitia, about 1520, and was a descendant of a German family settled in Italy. He was a physician by profession and no doubt received a very careful secular and religious education. This can be learned from the flattering titles which were accorded to him by the greatest rabbis of Poland, such as the "ReMa", Rabbi Moses Ben Israel Isserles of Cracow and Rabbi Johanan Ben Aaron Luria of Lublin, whenever they mention his name. From the expressions of Rabbi Isserles it can easily be guessed that Ashkenazi was also a good Talmudic scholar. In his responses, the Rabbi of Cracow does not designate him by any other title than "Rabbi Solomon Doctor." When Ashkenazi came as a young man to Poland in the train of the Italian wife of King Sigismund, Bona Sforza, he interested himself in the welfare of the Jews of Poland and gave them faithful service as a medical practitioner. In the year 1558 we find him as physician in ordinary to King Sigismund Augustus. Ashkenazi was not satisfied with his profession, but was more inclined and more talented as a politician and diplomat. After the death of King Sigismund Augustus, in 1572, a new King was to be elected. In conjunction with the French Ambassador, Bishop Muntluc, Ashkenazi started a wide agitation in favor of Henry of Anjou and succeeded in winning for him the Polish throne. When Henry of Anjou, aftward King Henry III, of France, ascended the throne of Poland, Ashkenazi wrote to him: 'I have rendered to Your Majesty most important service in securing your election. It was I who effected all that was done here." (Charriere, p. 932, note.) It was partly due to Ashkenazi's influence that the decree of banishment of the Jews from Venice was revoked July 19, 1573.

Right after Ashkenazi was successful in his endeavor in behalf of Henry of Anjou he left Poland for unknown reasons and went to Constantinople where he became the house physician of the Sultan and of the Grand Vizier Mahomet Pasha. But here, too, he occupied himself mostly with political affairs, and according to tradition he became the "eye" and "ear" of the Sultan. During the Turkish war with Venice for the possession of Cyprus (1570) he was appointed envoy extraordinary of the Porte to Venice, in 1574, with full power to conclude peace. But the Republic was unwilling to receive the Jew Ashkenazi and not until the Grand Vizier insisted was he finally acknowledged. Thereafter Venitian authorities paid him great honor and attention. He was received in state audience and signed the act of peace in behalf of Turkey, and at that time he rendered Poland an extraordinary service. The French Ambassador in Venice consulted him in regard to the contemplated flight of King Henry from Poland and when the French Ambassador revealed to him the bold projection of the King to make Poland, with the help of the German army, a French province, Ashkenazi answered with great indignation that the Poles will never consent to it and in case an attempt should be made to carry out this plan he will induce Turkey to take corresponding steps against this aspiration. With these words Ashkenazi paralyzed the intended action of the French. Some years later we find Ashkenazi again in the political arena of Poland. From there he carried on negotiations for the extension of a former peace agreement for eight years longer between the Porte and [illegible].

[illegible] the New York "Sun" [illegible] a very good article on Saul [illegible] supposed Jewish King of [illegible] by Edward Herbert. In [illegible] Edward Herbert surveys very aptly the political situation of Europe in the Sixteenth Century. His description can also be applied to Solomon Ashkenazi, whose political and diplomatic activity was developed only a few years after Saul Wahl should have occupied the Polish throne. I will therefore quote here some of Herbert Edwards' remarks. It will help the reader to understand more fully this historical sketch of the life and activity of Solomon Ashkenazi, who was such a prominent figure in Polish diplomacy during the last half of the Sixteenth Century. Under the title of "When a Jew Wore the Polish Crown," Edward Herbert states: "The Sixteenth Century was throughout Europe the great period of the rise of the middle class, of the development of the towns, of the emancipation of peasants, and in consequence of these movements came also the limitation of the powers of the aristocracy. It was the age of the influence of the reformation and the printing press. European states began now more and more to organize on a vast scale and one state reacted upon the other. But Poland had stood aloof from the great European conflict, although her relation with France had somewhat been strained on account of the flight of Henry de Valois."

Solomon Ashkenazi died in 1602, and was buried in Constantinople. He left three sons: Nathan, Samuel and Obadiah. His wife seems to have had some knowledge of medicine. After Ashkenazi's death she was called to the sickbed of Sultan Mehemed III and cured him of smallpox. (See Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. II, p. 201.)

It was told that the Voywood (Prince and head of the army) and the heads of the municipal officials as well as the other dignitaries, attended his funeral, an event which at that time was very unusual.

In the following century the descendants of Ashkenazi played a prominent role in the midst of the Polish Jewry. One of them was the famous Rabbi Zewi Ashkenazi called "Haham Zewi" of Lemberg. He was one of the greatest rabbis, but in every respect an aristocrat. It is characteristic that he always added to his name the word "sat," the initials of the two Hebrew words "Sephardy tohor," a pure Spaniard. In Lemberg Haham Zewi enjoyed great popularity and respect, not only among his co-religionists, but also among Christians.

The offspring of this family occupy high positions, especially in Polish cities like Lemberg, Lublin and Grodno.

Base Ingratitude.

Of all the vices which pull man down from the high pedestal upon which religon and morality have placed him and drag his soul in the dust, the iniquity of ingratude is one of the most revolting and most contemptible. It is, indeed, hard to believe that some of those very Jews who constantly clamor and claim that they and those who think and act as they do, are the only true confessors of Judaism, the only faithful followers of Jewish virtues and ideals, and that their hearts and souls are imbued with the burning desire to reawaken the Jewish conscience in the world by building a new future and by quickening a new hope for Israel, can be guilty of the black sin of ingratitude. Yet, some of these very pretenders stand today indicted before the bar of truth as transgressors, with malice aforethought, accused as calumniators and are found guilty of base ingratitude. Yes, to the shame and sorrow of every sincere American Jew it must be confessed that there are Jews in the midst of American Israel who are so blinded by fanaticism and whose minds are so poisoned by bigotry that they have lost all feelings of gratitude and all sense of justice and truth.

In the city of New York, where different Jewish gangsters are frequently creating the greatest chillul hashem, there exists also a gang of Yiddish editors who aspire to be leaders of their people, who never lose an opportunity to throw dirt upon any Jew who does not subscribe to their intrigues and chicaneries, and dares to do good without their kaskamah (sanction).

But while this New York coterie of disseminators of classic Yiddish do not spare any good man or useful organization, there is one name of a Jewish society which shines like a brilliant star in the firmament of contemporaneous history of the German Jewry, which is a thorn in the side of this Yiddish editorial gang and they are always on the lookout for an opportunity to besmirch its fair name and the good names of all who are connected with it. To mention the "Hilfsverein der deutschen Juden," or Dr. Paul Nathan, its presiding genius, is just like waving a red cloth before a mad bull. The "Hilfsverein" has always worked in the interest of Klal Yisrael, the entire Jewish people, and Dr. Paul Nathan has labored incessantly for the welfare of his people. Especially in the present woeful war conditions in Europe the society has gained, through the indefatigable exertions of Dr. Paul Nathan and other high standing German Jews, a great influence with the German government, which the society uses with telling effect for the benefit of the Russian Polish Jews in the territory now occupied by the German forces. The society is positively doing a vast amount of good to the helpless unfortunate Jewish victims of the war in Eastern Europe. It is the main distributor of relief money to the Jewish sufferers, because it has the good will and confidence of the German civil and military authorities there. And on account of these well-known facts and because the society works in its own wise, approved independent way and will not be dictated to by irresponsible chronic grumblers and unreasonable faultfinders who are obviously seeking to advance their own selfish ends, it has raised the ire of these Yiddish scandal-mongers to frenzy and distraction. No accusation, be it ever so false and unjust, is too bitter and too rankling for these self-appointed Yiddish leaders in the New York ghetto to be hurled at the Hilfsverein and at its managers.

Some time ago one of this crew attacked Dr. Paul Nathan in a shameful manner, which treacherous insolence at that time received a deserved scathing rebuke in the columns of the "News," and now comes another editor of this ilk and takes advantage of a joyful occasion in the midst of American Israel to traduce the highly meritorious Hilfsverein.

During the recent celebration by the well-known Jewish American philanthropist, Mr. Jacob Schiff, of his seventieth birthday, L. E. Miller, who is the publisher and editor of a Yiddish weekly in New York, published in his paper an open letter addressed to Mr. Schiff. In this letter Miller tried to convert Mr. Schiff to Zionism and Jewish nationalism and among other things he also wrote the following:

"Mr. Schiff, you have gained that which not many mortals succeeded in gaining during the time of their life.

"You have wealth, you have honor, you are recognized, you are beloved.

"But this is not enough.

"Not enough for you.

"You can make your name immortal.

"Here in America you help the assimilationists to strangle the Jewish national consciousness. You send your money to help the German Hilfsverein in its work of destruction and treachery (!?) against everything that is Jewish."

Oh, how vile must a public writer be who uses such a poison pen to utter such falsehood! How ungrateful and insidious must an editor be who calumniates in such a shameful manner! Why, it is enough to mantle the cheeks of every truth-loving man with burning shame! Will these reckless agitators and anarchists of the Yiddish press never learn to tell the truth? Mr. Schiff helps to strangle the Jewish consciousness here in America! Why, Mr. Schiff has given more of his wealth to Jewish orthodox institutions than any reform Jew has ever done in this or in any other country. The Hilfsverein destroys everything that is Jewish?! Why, if it were not for the blessed work of the Hilfsverein many thousands of Eastern Jews, the relatives and friends perhaps of these Jews in America who claim to be the only saviors of Judaism, would have long ago perished miserably from hunger and cold! Only the benevolent work of the Hilfsverein has kept them and their Judaism alive in Russian Poland and this scribbler Miller dares to call such work destructive and treacherous! He certainly cannot convert Mr. Schiff to Zionism by such flagrant falsehood. The Zionists of America can have no worse advocate than this man Miller, for instead of helping them to live, he digs a deep grave for all their hopes and aspirations.

In conclusion, I will state plainly that I am not writing this article out of condemnation of the entire Yiddish press. On the contrary, I read with pleasure such Yiddish papers as the "Tageblatt," the "Morning Journal" and other Yiddish newspapers which are clean and decent, which are not sensational sheets, but real educational and Americanizing mediums for the Jewish immigrants who come here from Russia, Galicia and Roumania and do not understand the English language. I write this article because as a Russian-born Jew it fills me with shame and sorrow to see how some of my whilom countrymen, who should be the guides to lead the new Jewish comers to the shores of this land of liberty in the ways of light and truth, mislead them in the paths of darkness and falsehood. It pains me, indeed, because I love my people, our God and our Torah, to see editors of Yiddish papers, who should help to unite, to weld and to cement the house of American Israel into one strong, great and influential body, tearing, rending and splitting it to splinters by constantly fanning the flames of the old petty jealousies, which so often proved disastrous for many a Jewish hope. Let us Russian Jews, who are now in the majority in the midst of American Israel, help to build and not to destroy. Let us forget the petty differences, all the coarseness and rudeness of the old little Kehillas, which were stamped upon our former lives of slavery and oppression by the iron hand of Russian tyranny. Let us all work shoulder to shoulder to attain the glorious destiny which the future holds in store for American Israel. When we will have shalom be-Yisral, peace in Israel, we will surely bring shalom al Yisral, peace upon Israel.

"A New Bible."

In reporting the banquet recently tendered by the Jewish Publication Society to the editors of the new English translation of the Hebrew Bible, some of the editors of our Jewish papers headed their articles "Editors of New Bible." This is, to say the least, a careless and misleading expression. The editors honored at this banquet did not write a new Bible, but they edited a new English translation of the old Hebrew Bible. Have these editors of our Jewish papers so quickly forgotten the ani maamins, the thirteen articles, or essenses, presented by Maimonides, in which the majority of the seven scholars who edited this new translation surely believe? The late Dr. Schechter certainly accepted the teaching of the RaM BaM, and no doubt his orthodox colleagues do the same today. They will surely deny that they had lent their aid to the creation of a new Bible which the ninth article of Maimonides forbids, for this article reads: "I believe in full faith that this Torah will not be changed and that there will not be another Torah from the Creator, blessed be His name."

The teachers of the Talmud wisely said: "Hahamim hizharu bedivrekhem," wise men, be careful in your expressions, and the learned editors of our Jewish papers should never forget this Talmudic instruction, for it is worth while remembering on all future occasions.

New Lodge to be Instituted in Philadelphia, Pa.

A charter has been granted for a lodge to be known as Freda Largman Lodge No. 805, to be instituted Wednesday evening, March 28. Bro. Abe Weil, past president of the district, is the organizer, and expects to initiate at the institution fully 100 members, if not more. The Freda Largman Beneficial Society, an organized body of 65 young men, have signified their intentions to become members, and each one has promised one.

On Wednesday evening, March 14, this society will hold an open or public meeting. A program is being arranged composed of several musical selections, and addresses to be delivered by prominent members of the Order for the purpose of enlightening the young men and their friends of the true objects of our Order, what it has accomplished in the past and what it will do in the future. The speakers will be Bro. Jacob Singer, member of the Executive Committee of the Order; ex-Assemblyman Joseph W. Salus, of New Jersey, also past president of District No. 3, and John L. Kun, Esq., Deputy Attorney General of Pennsylvania.

CONDITION OF JEWISH REFUGEES.

According to the information received by the Kiev Jewish Committee for the Relief of Victims of the War, the number of refugees in Lutsk has grown considerably of late. The influx of refugees from the neighboring villages does not cease, notwithstanding the cold, rainy season. (Several lines deleted by censor.) With the growth of the number of refugees, their grave condition is growing still worse. The number of houses allotted to the peaceful population is being reduced more and more, and the refugees have to live in unbelievable congestion. Not infrequently several families live in one room.

Give a little love to a child, and you will get a great deal back.—Ruskin.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

In accordance with its policy of attempting to prevent the circulation of discriminatory advertising, the Anti-Defamation League has drawn up the following draft of a bill which is designed to make it a misdemeanor for any place of public accommodation, resort or amusement, to publish advertisements intended to discriminate against any religious sect, creed, class, denomination or nationality:

AN ACT TO PREVENT DISCRIMINATION AT PLACES OF PUBLIC ACCOMMODATION, RESORT OR AMUSEMENT, AND TO PREVENT PUBLICATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF DISCRIMINATING MATTER AND TO PUBLISH THE SAME.

Section 1. Be It Enacted by the people of the State of ...., represented in...................., That no person, being the owner, lessee, proprietor, manager, superintendent, agent or employe of any place of public accommodation, resort or amusement shall directly or indirectly, by himself or anybody else publish, issue, circulate, send, distribute, give away or display in any way, manner, shape, means or method, except as hereinafter provided, any communication, paper, poster, folder, manuscript, book, pamphlet, writing, print, letter, notice or advertisement of any kind, nature or description, intended or calculated to discriminate or actually discriminating against any religious sect, creed, class, denomination or nationality, or against any of the members thereof in the matter of furnishing or neglecting or refusing to furnish to them or any one of them, any lodgings, housings, schooling, tuition, or any accommodation, right, privilege, advantage or convenience offered to or enjoyed by the general public, or to the effect that any of the accommodations, rights, privileges, advantages or conveniences of any such place of public accommodation, resort or amusement shall or will be refused, withheld from or denied to any person or persons or class of persons on account of race, sect, creed, class, denomination or nationality, or that the patronage, custom, presence, frequenting, dwelling, staying or lodging at such place of any person, persons, or class of persons belonging to or purporting to be of any particular race, sect, creed, class, denomination or nationality, is unwelcome, objectionable, or not acceptable, desired or solicited.

Sec. 2. The production of any such communication, paper, poster, folder, manuscript, book, pamphlet, writing, print, letter, notice or advertisement, purporting to relate to any such place and to be made by any person being the owner, lessee, proprietor, agent, superintendent, manager or an employe thereof, shall be presumptive evidence in any civil or criminal action or prosecution that the same was authorized by such person.

Sec. 3. A place of public accommodation, resort or amusement, within the meaning of this Act, shall be deemed to include any inn, tavern or hotel, whether conducted for the entertainment, housing or lodging of transient guests, or for the benefit, use or accommodation of those seeking health, recreation or rest, any restaurant, eating house, public conveyance on land or water, bath-house, barber shop, theater and music hall.

Sec. 4. Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to prohibit the mailing of a private communication in writing sent in response to specific written inquiry.

Sec. 5. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this Act, or who shall aid in or incite, cause or bring about in whole or in part the violation of any of such provisions, shall for each and every violation thereof be liable to a penalty of not less than One Hundred Dollars ($100), nor more than Five Hundred Dollars ($500), to be recovered by the person aggrieved thereby, and shall also for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than One Hundred Dollars ($100) nor more than Five Hundred Dollars ($500), or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty (30) days, nor more than ninety (90) days, or both such fine and imprisonment.

The bill was sent for the purpose of introduction in the State Legislatures to prominent members of the Order in about fifteen of the states holding regular legislative sessions commencing in January, 1917. Reports thus far received show that the bill has already been introduced in Illinois, Colorado, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Minnesota.

The Minnesota bill has already passed the House and is now pending before the Senate. In Connecticut on March 2, a hearing on the bill was had before the Judiciary Committee which was attended by Rabbi H. W. Ettelson, Brothers Joseph H. Ullman, Isaac Moss of Bridgeport; M. D. Saxe of New Britain, Charles C. Shapiro of Bridgeport and Senator Kopelman of Hartford. The Committee has not yet made its report, but Brother Shapiro, who has had charge of the work in that state, writes under date of March 3 that a favorable recommendation will, in his opinion, be made. In New Hampshire, a hearing on the bill was held before the Senate Committee on Judiciary on February 28. Brother Edward M. Chase of Manchester, N. H., who has been extremely energetic in his efforts to secure the passage of the bill in New Hampshire, appeared with a number of others before the Committee and succeeded in securing a unanimous recommendation from the Committee. Mr. Chase is entitled to much credit for the persistent efforts he has made in the face of great opposition from the hotel-keepers and summer resort owners. In Maine, a hearing on the bill was held at the State House in Augusta on March 8. Reports have not yet been received, indicating what action was taken. In Iowa, the bill has been placed in the hands of Senator Addison, M. Parker and Representative James Weaver, both of Des Moines, who have prepared a bill on the basis of the draft submitted to them and have introduced it in both Houses of the Legislature. The date of the Committee hearing has not yet been set. Through the efforts of Brother Milton L. Anfenger, the bill has been introduced in both Houses of the Colorado Legislature. The bill is also pending at the present time before the Senate of the Pennsylvania Legislature. In Nebraska, through the efforts of Brother Morris Friend of Lincoln, the bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator A. J. Sawyer of Omaha. A hearing was held on the bill on February 28. Favorable action was taken, but out of deference to a few of the Senators who had been unable to look into the merits of the bill, the hearing was continued. In Illinois, a hearing on the bill will be held on March 15. A committee of several prominent Chicago members will attend the hearing in Springfield and speak in favor of the bill. Members of the Order in each of these states are urged to write to their local members of the Legislature, urging them to vote for the passage of the bill.

The League has been very much encouraged by the unanimous support given to it in this work by all of the Lodges in various states where the bill has been, or is about to be introduced, and by the various sections of the Council of Jewish Women located in those states. Most of the lodges and sections of the Council have adopted resolutions endorsing the measure, and are awaiting word that the bill has been, in fact, introduced, to send copies of the same to members of the Legislatures.

The sole object of the League in endorsing the passage of the bill is to prevent publication and distribution of discriminating matter. What the Order had in mind in entering upon this campaign and what the League most earnestly wishes to prevent and prohibit by law, is the spreading broadcast throughout the land of leaflets, posters, folders or circulars containing such language as, "Jews and Dogs Not Wanted," "Jews and Consumptives Not Wanted," and similar phrases. No one who has not paid particular attention to the matter has any adequate idea of the extent to which this practice prevails or of the tendency it has to bring the Jew in contempt and hold him up to ridicule and scorn.

The League has never attempted to force hotel keepers to accept Jews as guests. No self-respecting Jew has any desire to become a guest of such a place, and the activities of the League are directed entirely toward the far greater evil—the method by which that discrimination is made known.

The Secretary of the League has received a large number of circulars during the past few months which contain offensive advertisements such as those above quoted. Most of these are circulated by resorts located in a few states which nature has blessed with equable climates and beautiful scenery and where, as a consequence, summer resorts are numerous. However, the literature is circulated throughout the country, and though some of the states where the act will be passed may have no summer resorts at all, the act will prevent the circulation of this pernicious form of advertising sent out from resorts located in other states. It was formerly the practice of newspapers to accept this style of advertising, but in recent years, owing to the activities of the League, that practice has been almost entirely discontinued. The League has found that newspapers are unanimously opposed to this practice. One of the few instances which has come to the attention of the Board in the past year, occurred in a recent issue of "The Georgian American," of Atlanta, Georgia. As an indication of the spirit of co-operation given us by the newspapers, the correspondence passing between the Board and the editor are re-printed:

January 20, 1917.

The Editor Atlanta "American,"
Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Sir:—In your issue of December 17, on page 8, section "C," you published an advertisement of Timrod Hall, Camden, S. C., in which the following sentence occurs:

"Patronage of transients and Hebrews not desired."

We do not pretend to regulate the business policy of any hotel, or to deny the right of any hotel or summer resort to take Jews or refuse them lodging as they please, but we do not believe any responsible publication should print an advertisement containing announcement of such a discriminatory policy. These advertisements are read by thousands of people. Many of them are easily influenced by the printed word. A statement such as that above, for example, may be read by young people who have no preconceived prejudice against the Jew, but on reading this advertisement they may readily come to the conclusion that Jews must be a very undesirable class of citizen, if the management of a public place of lodging deems it best that they should not be accepted as guests. Thousands who will read this "ad" will not appreciate the economic causes, or the ignorance and bigotry which actuate that policy.

We trust that you will see the validity of our argument and that your newspaper will refuse to accept copy containing statements such as that quoted above.

Thanking you for a favorable response to our request, we are

Very respectfully,
MANAGING BOARD.

February 1, 1917.

Mr. Leon L. Lewis,
Secretary Anti-Defamation League,
1228 Tribune Building,
Chicago, Illinois.

Dear Mr. Lewis:—We very much appreciate the courtesy of your favor of the 20th ultimo regarding the advertisement we have been running for Timrod Hall, Camden, South Carolina.

The line to which you object is also objectionable to us and we cannot understand how it got through without being censored.

It so happens that the Timrod Hall contract has expired for the season, but we can assure you that if it had not, the objectionable phrase would have been eliminated or the advertising refused altogether.

This paper carries a great deal more hotel and resort advertising than any other newspaper in this part of the country. Realizing that an error of this kind might possibly occur again, we are instructing all concerned with the handling of hotel and resort business that such a line will not be printed.

Thanking you for having called our attention to this, we are,

Very sincerely yours,
THE "GEORGIAN-AMERICAN,"
T. B. Hilton,
TBH:LBM Manager Resort Dept.

February 5, 1917.

M. T. B. Hilton,
Manager Resort Department,
The "Georgian-American,"
Atlanta, Georgia.

My Dear Mr. Hilton:—We are in receipt of your letter of the 1st inst., in reply to our communication of January 20th. On behalf of the Managing Board I wish to thank you and your paper for your action in this matter.

Under separate cover I am sending you several copies of a "Note On the Proper Use of the Word 'Jew,'" which we have prepared. If you will have these placed next to your copy desks I believe that slip-ups of this character will be unlikely to recur.

Very sincerely yours,
MANAGING BOARD,

The Managing Board of the League requests that copies of all letters that may be received by any individual or organization from a member of the legislature in response to a request for favorable consideration of this act, be sent to the Secretary of the League, Leon L. Lewis, 1228 Tribune Building, Chicago, Illinois, so that proper record of proceedings may be made and due publicity given in these columns to the propaganda in each state.

Vaudeville Vigilance Committees.

Early in November, President Kraus addressed to all of the lodges in the Order a request that each lodge appoint a committee to be known as "Vaudeville Vigilance Committee," to assist the League in its efforts to check up on defamatory vaudeville acts. A large percentage of the lodges have to date appointed these committees. All lodges that have not already done so, are urged by the Managing Board to appoint such committees at an early date. For their information, and in order that the scope of the work expected from such committees may be understood in advance, the following letter, which was sent out by the Secretary to all members of the Vigilance Committees thus far appointed, is re-printed:

Dear Sir and Brother:

The Secretary of your lodge has informed me that you have been appointed as a member of the Vaudeville Vigilance Committee for your city.

We are attempting to keep on file in this office a complete card index of all acts impersonating the Jew, whether they be objectionable or otherwise, and also of all acts which contain jokes or songs with reference to the Jew. Our main purpose in doing this is in order that we may have accurate information as a basis for determining the justice or injustice of any complaint sent to us.

Wherever possible we would like to have a detailed description of the act, especially of such portions as the Vigilance Committee deems objectionable. If the act is a long one we would like to have a stenographic transcript made of the same, the expense of which we shall, of course, expect to stand. In the event that the act is obviously objectionable a complaint should be made to the manager of the theater and prompt report made to this office, so that we may take the matter up at once with the manager of the circuit.

I am enclosing herewith reprint of a portion of the annual report of the League dealing with objectionable vaudeville acts. The reprint indicates the attitude of the Managing Board and the policy which governs the League in its objections.

Please do not hesitate to call upon us at any time for such information as you may desire and we shall give your letters prompt and careful attention.

Thanking you for your co-operation in this work, I am,

Yours in B. B. L. and H.
LEON L. LEWIS,
Secretary.

THE HEBREW SCHOOLS OF PALESTINE.

Young Judea has decided upon an extensive campaign on behalf of the Hebrew schools of Palestine. It intends to appeal to the Hebrew school boys and girls of America, and through them, to their parents and relatives to assist the Hebrew schools of Palestine. A Schalachmonos collection will be made in all the Hebrew and Congregational schools throughout the country. Committees are being formed in all of the large cities, as well as in the smaller communities, and it is the hope of Young Judea to reach 100,000 or more children throughout the country, who will give substantial assistance to the Palestine Hebrew School Fund.

DREYFUS DEFENDER DIES.

Manuel Baudoin, President of the Court of Cassation, and who was Attorney General of the court at the time of the famous trial of Major Alfred Dreyful for treason, died last night. He was 70 years old. In 1906 M. Baudoin delivered an extended argument before the court, in which he contended that Dreyfus was innocent of the charge against him and declared that the greater part of the evidence at the Rennes court-martial, by which he was convicted, was a tissue of lies. His argument, which covered a period of ten days, was followed by the vindication of Dreyfus. M. Baudoin was the author of many legal works.

"MERCHANT OF VENICE."

Victoria Lodge No. 758 of Victoria, British Columbia, appointed a committee to wait on the Minister of Education of British Columbia and to request him to use his good offices to eliminate the "Merchant of Venice" from the British Columbia public schools, college and university curriculum. The committee waited on the Minister on Friday, Feb. 9. with the result that the Minister, Dr. J. D. McLean, promised that he would do all in his power to grant the request of the lodge. The committee presented a formal letter to the Minister, which he promised to read to the members of the House of British Columbia Legislature.

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION BY ABRAHAM LODGE No. 89, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

The fiftieth anniversary celebration of the founding of Abraham Lodge No. 89, of Bridgeport, Conn., was ushered in with services at the Park Avenue Temple on Sunday evening, Feb. 11, 1917.

The exercises consisted of responsive reading, prayer, the singing of the Jubilee hymn and addresses by Mr. J. B. Klein, president of the lodge, and Honorable Simon Wolf, of Washington, Past President of the Order. The prayer offered by Rabbi David Levy embodied the thoughts which were in reality the keynote of the gathering, calling the blessing of God upon the B'nai B'rith, the important achievements of which were to be set forth.

The address of welcome was made by President Klein, who spoke in part as follows:

"Here in the edifice—erected to the worship of the one God—it is, indeed, most fitting that we should hold this celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the institution of Abraham Lodge No. 89, a unit of that great organization, the I .O. B. B.—an organization which has stood since its inception for all that is, and has been, truly good in American Judaism.

"Grateful ought we to be to those whose thoughtful minds and pious hearts conceived; to those whose self-sacrificing and tireless zeal has promoted this Order and this lodge.

"But far beyond and above all, grateful for that religious principle which constitutes the corner-stone of all that is noblest, most lasting and most beneficent in the march of our progress.

"It has been said that sorrows shared with others are but half sorrows, while the joys we divide with our friends are double joys. Hence in this hour of exultation, we are gratified to see so large an assemblage of our friends present. For this sign of love and friendship, I beg to offer you in behalf of Abraham Lodge, which I have the honor to represent, our many, many thanks, and at the same time to extend a cordial and fraternal welcome. May this rare event prove to you a source of genuine happiness and may you carry from this place, impressions as deeply imperishable, as the sublime faith to which these ceremonies are designed to testify.

"For two score years and ten, Abraham Lodge has cheerfully borne the burden and has taught generations past the principles of our fraternity."

The address of welcome was followed with singing by the congregation of the Jubilee Hymn written by Rabbi Levy. President Klein then introduced as the speaker of the evening, Honorable Simon Wolf, of Washington. Mr. Wolf's address in part follows.

History of Inception.

"On the eve of the birthday of the great American 'with malice toward none and charity for all', we are assembled to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of an organization named after Abraham, the friend of God, and another Abraham, the friend of humanity. This organization is a branch of a national and international body that had its inception in the brains of a few German immigrants who, realizing the prejudice and what is synonymous therewith, ignorance by the mass of people as to those who differ from them either in language or faith—thought it proper to devise a scheme by which their coreligionists, irrespective of nationality or ritualism, could be fraternized in a spirit consistent with American ideals, and the spiritual fervor of Judaism. While it was and is to a limited degree a secret organization, it at no time was to be a menace to the state or to society, but simply an educator and uplift for the betterment of their own and all mankind. Differences were to be reconciled and the lodge room was to be made the center of that broad and liberal spirit that makes the whole world kin.

"And thus what was considered a dream has been more than realized in the seventy-five years of its existence, fifty of which Abraham Lodge as a constituent, has fittingly lived and contributed its quota to the development and prosperity, not only of the organization, but of the community in which it has found a home. The general public is not fully advised as to the splendid record this noble organization has made at home and abroad, even some of their own coreligionists have not at all times given due credit to the wonderful achievements of this Order. It has been at the forefront of every question that tended to the strengthening of the ties between [illegible] man. It has been the loyal and [illegible] opponent of every measure that [illegible] oppression or discrimination. It has been the advocate of liberty and equality throughout the world. Among its founders and their descendants, men who opposed human slavery on this soil and who fought for the maintenance of the flag were found in large numbers.

Accomplished Much.

"In civic life, in every community of this and other countries, their brawn and brain, integrity of character are dominant and prominent. While they have been true to their faith, vindicating by their conduct the highest principles of ethical Judaism, they have at all times been lovers of the republic, patriotic sons, whose ambition it has been to stand as an example for one and all. The organization has built orphan homes, hospitals, homes for aged and infirm, hospitals for consumptives, and for those who are suffering with rheumatic diseases; has given to the United States a living proof of the grand principle that underlies our whole fabric of liberty, separation of church and state, by erecting in Fairmont Park, Philadelphia, a statue to religious liberty, chiseled by an American Jew, born in Virginia, a member of the Order of B'nai B'rith, whose name has since become famous throughout the world, Sir Mosely Ezekiel, now of Rome, Italy.

"It created the Roumanian Mission, and sent one of its gifted sons as representative, who contributed to the Berlin Treaty, which unfortunately has since been, as so many other treaties have, violated, and to sustain which the Order contributed large sums on two different occasions. It caused the sending of the famous Kishineff Petition to Russia—while it was unavailing in its purpose, yet thrilled the world and tended to strengthening of the United States internationally.

"In every calamity at home and abroad, the Order was generous in its contributions in aid of the suffering, not only among their own ranks, but to those of other faiths and organizations, notably in this hour of European calamity, when men of the same faith and culture are fighting each other, the Order has generously and loyally remitted to the wounded and suffering large sums; and the future gives no indication that we will not have to make larger contributions, as a matter of duty, not of sacrifice, for the old slogan can never die, 'All Israels are Brethren,' to which we have added the other and nobler, 'All Men Are Brethren.'

Flag Is Its Symbol.

"The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is the only national and international Jewish organization in the United States, and at no time in its history has it been of greater service than under its present leadership, whose diplomacy, intelligence and tact are unsurpassed, Adolf Kraus.

"Its symbol is the American flag—that grand emblem of unification and equality, which has done so much in the past to bring home to the stricken and unfortunate of every land, this great and glorious republic of opportunity. And this emblem, with all its unifying attributes, will in the near future be recognized all the world over as the arbiter for peace and justice.

"What a privilege it is. my friends, to live in a country so blest as ours. To be a part of the great whole of citizenship that confers such dignity and honor; where each and every man under the flag stands equal; where merit and not creed is the factor for recognition and promotion.

Has Risen High.

"The Jew as an American citizen need offer no apology in any direction. He has shown in every field of human activity his worth and his lofty conception of duty to the country of his birth or adoption. The immigrant of the past, coming here under adverse conditions, has risen to the very height of American citizenship—and those men of Jewish faith, but of American ideals, have risen in all the walks of official life, equal to the best and inferior to none, and it is meet and proper that we should thus vindicate by our conduct that we are fully conscious of what this country confers—and the younger generation, the citizen of the future, should never forget what their ancestors may have had to suffer in lands of oppression in contradistinction to that which they here enjoy. Jew and Christian, immigrant and the men to the manner born, must all blend together in harmonious endeavor to uphold the best principles of the republic, and to hand down to the generations that are yet to come the priceless heritage, founded by Washington and preserved by Abraham Lincoln, whose immortal words at Gettysburg will ring clear and resonant that this is a government of the people, for the people and by the people. Let us then all unite in the grand chorus —'My country, it is of thee, sweet land of liberty,

To thee we sing'."

Jubilee Banquet.

The banquet opened by a reception and in line as the beautifully gowned women and prominent citizens of Bridgeport stopped to pay respects were: Hon. Marcus H. Colcomb, Governor of Connecticut; Hon. Simon Wolf, of Washington; Dr. Edward N. Calisch, of Richmond, Va.; Hon. Clifford B. Wilson, mayor of the city; Homer S. Cummings, State's Attorney; Maurice P. Davidson, of New York, First Vice-President of the District, and Sol Sulzberger, of New York, Treasurer of the District.

Mr. Jacob Klein, who was President of the District Grand Lodge for three consecutive terms, acted as toastmaster and in his words of welcome as president of the lodge, called attention to the various achievements of members of the community, as well as to the accomplishments by the lodge, remarking that the women of the lodge formed the first Red Cross Society in Bridgeport.

Loud cheers and continued applause greeted Governor Holcomb when he was presented to the audience. He prefaced his remarks by paying a tribute to the many ladies present.

Knows Jew as American.

"I don't know much about the Old Testament on which your religion is founded, but my friend Homer Cummings, knows all about it. He has studied it from Genesis to Revelation. know only of the Jew as a simple American. America knows no Gentile nor Jew. This country stands for absolute freedom and equality. There are Jews in every avenue of civil life, in the trades, the professions and the offices of the state and nation—not because they are Jews, but because they are competent Americans. They are chosen because of their manhood and their ability to fill high places.

"We are now living in strenuous times. The first thing that we look at in the morning is the news columns to see how many vessels have been sunk and whether the trouble has passed that boundary line which will plunge us into war with Germany. Woodrow Wilson was not only candidate for president, but when he was elected, he became my president. The state of Connecticut is back of him and the Jews and loyal Americans, taking just pride in their government, are back of him and back of this state and nation to the last drop of their blood."

Honorable Simon Wolf, characterized by the toastmaster as "The true American, the man who devoted his life to the cause of humanity," was the next speaker. Mr. Wolf in a ringing speech upon "The Jew Throughout all Times and His Future," said:

"America has always been an inspiration to all the struggling masses across the sea from the time of Jefferson, and will continue to be so after the war is over.

"Pride of ancestry is not alone to be credited for the rise of this great nation, for the men of the American Revolution made their impress upon the nation's history. He recalled a Polish exile who gave $250,000 to the American cause, which has stood as a debt still unpaid after generations although a bill for the payment of this debt to the Jewish descendants has passed back and forth between the houses at Washington for more than a century."

The principal address of the evening was made by Reverend Dr. Edward N. Calisch, of Richmond, Va., one of the noted literary men of the country. In his address he told of the discrimination, social, political and industrial, with which the Jewish people have to contend even in this country, the land of the free. He pointed out that one of the primary objects of the Order was to watch for cases of such discrimination and to see that justice was accorded to the Jew.

"We do not want people to elect Jews to office because they are Jews," said he, "nor yet keep them from office because they are Jews. The B'nai B'rith stands for a square deal. All it wants is equality for all men of the Jewish race. Our Christian friends have many misconceptions and misapprehensions concerning the Jews. We ask of them only even handed justice, we do not want simply tolerance. No one realizes better than we do the unkind mental attitude of many Christians.

"We have entered into the life of all people. We have taken our place in the affairs of all nations. We differ from our fellow citizens only in our religious outlook.

"There are still certain handicaps against us which make it difficult for us to get a square deal in all walks of life, in all professions and in all trades.

Recent Discrimination.

"Social discrimination is practiced against us. Social discrimination against individuals as such is just. Every man and woman has a right to say who he or she shall receive into his home, for every man's home is his castle. Every man has a right to choose his social companions. But it is not right to practice such discrimination against us on a wholesale plan, as it is not right to practice such discrimination by houses, hotels and clubs. We resent that, not because it is social discrimination, but because it is wholesale social discrimination. Let such discrimination not be against a class, but against individuals.

"We seek a square deal in art, literature, the motion pictures and the magazines. A few years ago when a muckraking author wanted to choose a villian, he made him a Jew. Now much of this is changed and there is less of this sort of thing."

Dr. Calisch gave an excellent resume of the work of the Order of B'nai B'rith throughout the country and the world. He said that it was organized 75 years ago and had been born of the spirit of altruism, and the desire to give the Jewish people a common platform on which they could stand as brothers.

"The aims of the Order of B'nai B'rith," said Dr. Calisch, "are to give a square deal to the Jews, to inculcate the idea of a square deal from the Christians to the Jews, from the Jews to the Christians and from the Jews to their fellow Jews. The Order emphasizes as its fundamental elements the rights of humanity.

"It has established many institutions of a benevolent character, such as homes, asylums, hospitals, colleges and schools. It has organized and endowed an institution for every year of its life.

Is World Problem.

"The B'nai B'rith, with its branches all over the world realizes that the problem of the Jew is a world problem. It has nothing to do with politics, but works constantly and consistently for fair play for the Jew in all parts of the world. It has rescued Jews from bondage in Russia, from all sorts of abuse in many countries of the world, and done much to establish the principles of brotherhood, harmony and concord throughout the nations of the world. The problem of discrimination against the Jew with which it has to contend ought not to exist. It is a blot on the civilization of Christian nations that it does exist, but the B'nai B'rith is doing much to break down this prejudice."

Rabbi David Levy in an eloquent manner, recited the history of the inception and growth of Abraham Lodge, which was also, in substance, a history of the Jewish people of Bridgeport.

Mayor Wilson responded to the toast, "The City," and on behalf of the municipality welcomed the distinguished guests. He told of the great part played in the life of the community by the Jewish men and women and congratulated the Lodge on its anniversary celebration.

Mr. Cummings, State's Attorney, speaking on the subject, "Fraternalism," with eloquence characterized the Jewish people as one in which the principal of equality, fair play and freedom were inherent and firmly inculcated principals, and added his felicitations to the Lodge.

Mr. Jos. Rosenzweig and Mr. Sol Sulzberger told of achievements of the Order and of its efforts to be of service to the community.

Mr. Maurice P. Davidson responded to the toast, "The Ladies." He showed the part the Jewish women played in the field of charity and the invaluable aid which they had always given to all projects of that nature of the Order.

An interesting feature of the affair was the meeting of Mr. Simon Wolf and Henry Kempinski, whom Mr. Wolf assisted in having him released from Russia over a quarter of a century ago. This was a most impressive scene, as Brother Kempinski publicly expressed words of respect and gratitude to Brother Wolf for what he had done for him.

A feature of the celebration was also a meeting of the lodge at which a class of sixty-two candidates were initiated by the splendid Degree Team of the Lodge. The visiting delegation from sister lodges expressed their praise for the excellent work shown by the team.

At the banquet Harmony Lodge No. 711, of Bridgeport, presented Abraham Lodge with the "Ten Commandments" engraved in stone, and Horeb Lodge No. 25, of New Haven, Conn., presented the lodge with a beautiful silk flag trimmed around its border with gold fringing.

Many congratulatory letters and telegrams were received from the President and other prominent members of the Order and a number sister lodges.

Much of the success of the anniversary celebration was due to the General Committee that had charge of the arrangements and of which Brother Jacob B. Klein was Chairman.

RAMAH LODGE.

An unusually well attended meeting of the lodge was held at the Red Room Hotel LaSalle on Monday evening, February 12, 1917. The special feature of the evening was the initiation of a class of forty candidates by the degree team of the Lodge and the presentation of over fifty new applications for membership, which were referred to investigating committees.

A number of charitable donations were made by the lodge among them, $500 for the establishment of a boys' summer camp under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council; $50 to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, Hot Springs; $10 to the institute for the blind at Palestine, Jerusalem; $150 for charitable purposes of the Central B'nai B'rith Council.

Dr. Charles S. Levi, of Milwaukee, was the guest of honor and delivered an eloquent address on the subject, "Foundation of a New Civilization." His address was well received, and at its conclusion, upon motion of Brother Judge Philip Stein, a rising vote of thanks was extended to the speaker.

ORIENTAL HILLEL LODGE.

On Feb. 27, 1917, a meeting of Oriental Hillel Lodge No. 72 was held at its new lodge quarters in the East Room of the Hotel La Salle. There were present 250 members, including the guests of the evening, the officers and members of the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago. A class of candidates was initiated and the lodge was favored by a most interesting talk by Dr. Gotthard Deutsch of Cincinnati. His topic was "Humor and Pathos in Jewish Folklore."

The evening concluded with a luncheon.

DAVID FISH LODGE.

At a regular meeting of the lodge held at the Morrison Hotel on Monday, February 19th, which was well attended, Rabbi David Alexander, of Toledo, Ohio, addressed the lodge on the subject, "The Spiritual Alliance—Israel and America." The meeting was attended by a large number of visiting brethren from the other lodges of the city and they were amply repaid for their attendance while listening to the eloquent address by Brother Alexander. A number of candidates were initiated and several applications for membership were presented.

CENTRAL B'NAI B'RITH COUNCIL.

The Council held its monthly meeting on February 5, 1917, which was well attended. The various standing committees, such as on Free Employment Bureau, Social Service, Intellectual Advancement and Summer Camp submitted their reports. The report of the Summer Camp Committee was pleasing in view of the fact that it brought a definite report stating that the site of Long Lake, Ill., has been graciously placed at the disposal of the Council by the Consumers Company for the purpose of establishing a permanent summer camp for poor Jewish boys. Furthermore, that the committee was able to secure the promise of free transportation for all the boys. It was resolved to appeal to the local lodges for financial contributions to enable the Council to establish the camp on a permanent basis.

The Committee on Social Service work particularly emphasized the good results being accomplished in connection with the Big Brother Movement under the able management of Brother L. Edward Lashman. Various appropriations for charitable purposes were made and it was resolved to request the lodges to increase their appropriation to the council for charitable purposes.

Forty candidates were initiated by the degree team of the Council, consisting of Brothers A. B. Seelenfreud and Harry Okin. Short talks were delivered by various members of the Order.

After much planning on the part of the Jewish citizens of Jackson, their hopes were materialized on Sunday, March 4, when David Heuman Lodge No. 807 was regularly instituted. At a most enthusiastic meeting held in Temple Beth Israel, over forty men, many of whom were members of the old Jackson Lodge, were initiated into the Order. The District Grand Lodge was represented by Mr. L Edward Lashman, in charge of the Social Service work for Chicago. Mr. Lashman extended to David Heuman Lodge, the greetings of the District Grand Lodge. The initiation was conducted by a team composed of Brothers Edward Lichtig of Bay City, E. Simon of Lansing, and L. Edward Lashman of Chicago. Following the initiation, the following officers were elected and duly installed: President, M. Heuman; Vice-President, S. A. Schwartz; Secretary, W. W. Lindenbaum; Treasurer, R. Tannenbaum; Monitor, Joseph Wolf; Assistant Monitor, Leo Heuman; Warden, S. Muskin; Trustees, A. L. Weiger (term three years); A. Traub (term two years), M. Levy (term one year.)

Mr. Lashman reviewed the work of the B'nai B'rith during the past few years. He explained what is being accomplished by the Anti-Defamation League, spoke of the different B'nai B'rith institutions and explained the Social Service work now being conducted by the Central Council of Chicago. The members of the lodge were also addressed by Brothers Lichtig, Simon and Rabbi Freund.

In the evening, a public meeting was held in the Temple. After a brief memorial service to David Heuman after whom the lodge was named, those present were addressed by Rabbi Freund, who spoke upon "Patriotism," and by Mr. Lashman who gave a talk on "Social Service." Following the meeting refreshments were served.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

At a regular meeting of Cleveland Lodge No. 16 held on February 8, a large class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

Owing to the popularity of the social evenings arranged by the lodge, the dance committee arranged another B'nai B'rith dance for Sunday evening February 18, which was largely attended by members of the Order and their friends.

On Sunday evening February 25, a specially good program was carried out by the Intellectual Advancement committee of the lodge.

On February 28, 1917, a smoker of the lodge was held. A clever program, an excellent entertainment and good addresses were features of the evening. This was the first smoker of the lodge for this year and it is expected to be the forerunner of similar affairs during the year. The Committee spared no pains or effort to secure the best entertainment, and an unusual unique and novel evening was the result.

The B'nai B'rith All Star Team defeated the Cleveland Umpires of the Industrial League two games out of three. Another match game is being arranged for.

At a meeting of the lodge held on February 14, at B'nai B'rith Building, Rabbi Newton Krass of Temple Israel, Brooklyn, addressed the members of the lodge. He answered questions asked from the floor and a general discussion followed his speech.

The members of the B'nai B'rith Salesmen's Club met on February 15. Owing to the unusual interest in this movement, the scope of the club has been enlarged.

Cleveland Lodge No. 16 is forming a Debating and Literary Department to which all members of the lodge are eligible. The first meeting was held on Sunday February 18 at which the plans of the organization and kindred matters were considered and acted upon.

B'nai B'rith Day Celebration By Milwaukee Lodges

One of the most inspiring celebrations ever held in Milwaukee was the occasion of the observance of B'nai B'rith Day, fittingly celebrated at a banquet at the Hotel Pfister on Thursday evening, February 1, by the Milwaukee Lodges. It will be long remembered as one of the most memorable events in the history of B'nai B'rith in Wisconsin. Nearly three hundred members and their ladies participated in this affair which was held under the auspices of the Milwaukee B'nai B'rith Council.

Not only were the members of the lodges honored by the visit of Dr. H. I. Davis, president of the District Grand Lodge, and Brother Hugo Sonnenschein of Chicago, but Governor Emanuel L. Phillip, made a special trip from Madison to take part in this celebration. It was the first time that the Governor of the State of Wisconsin had so honored the members of the Order in Wisconsin. The program had been carefully prepared and was successfully carried out by the Council Committee under the guidance of Brother Harry Abrams.

From the time that Brother Charles L. Aarons, former president of the District Grand Lodge, who acted as toastmaster, presented Governor Phillip and until Brother Hugo Sonnenschein finished his address the audience was constantly thrilled by the oratory of the speakers. When Governor Phillip was presented by the toastmaster he was greeted with loud applause and cheered for several minutes while the orchestra played "On Wisconsin." The Governor immediately expressed his appreciation to the Milwaukee B'nai B'rith Council that he had been invited to take part in the evening celebration.

Address of Governor Phillip.

"I am glad to be here because I have an interest in you and because I am also directly interested in your organization and its purpose, as I am interested in all organizations whose purpose is the promotion of humanity and human interest. One of the cardinal virtues of your society as I understand it is that you are banded together for the purpose of aiding your people and others who may be in need of assistance from their fellow citizens, not only in charity, but in the general uplifting that is necessary to make men and women better men and better women.

In my experience as governor, I have been deeply gratified with Jewish organizations in their charitable work, not only for the purpose of supplying funds for the other and greater purpose which you worked for most effectively. I do not know of any people who have taken so much interest in their people as the Jewish people. You see to it that the newcomer has a start. I do not know of any other people who do as much for their own flesh and blood.

Now, just a word on the matter of charity as you practice it. As you know, it is the duty of the Governor of the State to exercise his judgment in the matter of appeals for pardon from the unfortunates in our prisons. It is the policy of the State of Wisconsin for some years gone by to deal as leniently as possible with men of that class. It has been my purpose and the purpose of my predecessors to open the doors of the prison for him who has done wrong and give him another chance in the world. That is one of the purposes of your organization. To give those of that class of unfortunates an opportunity to become respectable citizens of the United States, in that field there is a great opportunity.

I want to commend you if it is your purpose, as I understand it, to take up that question, particularly among your own people and try to uplift those who have fallen or have violated the law. If you give them a helping hand when they are trying to become better citizens you not only render a great service to society and the state, but you are doing a work which will be most satisfactory to yourself. I want to say there is always room for intelligent, well directed service, whether it be in the form of money, whether it be in the form of good influence or whatever form it may take. In this great and growing country you can never be idle if you want to devote your lives to that cause.

The Jewish people have succeeded in the face of oppression. They have contributed their share of literature, music, art and the sciences and they have done it in spite of the fact that they have been oppressed and persecuted in Europe. A people that is able to accomplish this in spite of all oppression is entitled to respect. The Jews have maintained themselves in a position in the affairs of the world that speak well of their ability and particularly of their re-co-operative power. Persecuted and robbed as they have been, they have nevertheless maintained themselves in a position of first importance in the commercial world, and have contributed their share to the world's progress. In our own country your people have found a haven for their religion where there can be no persecution because of religious views. You derive the same benefits from our country as other citizens and therefore the duties which you owe this country and this government are the same that fall upon the other citizens.

Your people are coming here in great numbers. Many are not acquainted with American institutions. Many fear and hate government because all government has always persecuted them. Help make them good and strong American citizens.

The President of the District, Bro. Dr. Haim I. Davis, of Chicago, was then presented to the audience and delivered an inspiring talk on the subject "Our Order". He reviewed the early history of the Order and its progress up to the present time, bringing his remarks to a close with the presentation of the work of the Order along the lines of Social Service and the protection of the fair name of the Jew.

"The Grandchildren of the Ghetto."

Mr. Hugo Sonnenschein spoke on the subject, "The Grandchildren of the Ghetto." In introducing the subject the speaker said that the title was not only suggestive of the entire sweep of our history from persecution to prosperity, but that it also suggested one of the most vital problems in modern Jewish life, viz.: whether we are still spiritually childen of the ghetto, Jews in thought, belief and ideals, or whether we have simply become children of our modern day alike with our Gentile neighbors with naught to differentiate us but vague memories of some traditions and ceremonies whose meaning is misunderstood and with some few facial characteristics fast disappearing.

The speaker then reviewed the history of Israel's wanderings, persecutions and triumphs from the days of the destruction of the Temple until the establishment of the European ghettoes.

The speaker then touched upon the ghetto life, its persecutions and tribulations, its intensified home life, its stress upon knowledge of Jewish literature, its strong Jewish idealism, its optimism.

The speaker next considered the contrast in the lives of the grandchildren of the ghetto in America where they are rich, successful, well educated and with every opportunity of life opened to them. They are beginning to lose interest in and knowledge of their Judaism, and with it the Jewish ideals of social service, devotion, self-sacrifice. Lacking these ideals and grown rich they have in some instances become selfish, ostentatious, greedy and lawless. The result has been the steady growth of Anti-Semitism in America.

The speaker then developed the theme that the most vital question for us in America is whether our Judaism had message and meaning in busy, throbbing, successful America.

The theory was next advanced that the great principles of social service, of righteousness of heaven to be realized here on earth of the increasing of the humanity of men on earth even sound Jewish and not Christian doctrines and that they are the ideals most needed in the life of the American nation today; that the best gift which the Jews can give to America is the spiritual treasures of the ideals of Prophetic Judaism; that to be good citizens the American Jews should live up to the test that Judaism has to give. That if the Jews would only learn and live their own Judaism, become familiar with their own history, literature and ethics, they could develop the ideals necessary for their proper living under the new conditions of American life, they would be bound together by common belief and ideals so that all Jewish organizations rooted in our common Jewishness could flourish and we would discharge our full duty to the nation of which we are citizens.

The speaker concluded with a plea for renewed interest in things Jewish and showed that through organization like the B'nai B'rith lay the hope of revitalizing and re-establishing a vigorous, strong and effective Jewish consciousness in America.

Representatives from many of the lodges of Wisconsin came to Milwaukee for the occasion. After the banquet, a reception was held and this was followed by dancing. It was after 2 o'clock when the strains of "The End of a Perfect Day" announced the close of this wonderful evening. The Council Committee which handled this affair included Harry Abrams, chairman; Dr. Charles S. Levi, Alfred Teller, Joseph A. Padway and I. G. Strauss.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATION BY FORT SMITH LODGE, FORT SMITH, ARK.

With the presence of President of the District, Bro. E. R. Bernstein, of Shreveport, La., as guest of honor, the annual celebration of B'nai B'rith Day at Fort Smith Lodge No. 306 on Sunday, Jan. 28, 1917, was the most successful and inspiring in the history of the lodge, which also on the same occasion celebrated its thirty-sixth anniversary.

In the afternoon a special meeting of the lodge was held in the vestry rooms of the Temple, which was well attended and a large class of candidates was initiated by the President of the District. This was followed by installation of officers for the ensuing term.

In the evening a public meeting was held at the Progress Club, which proved to be one of the best attended of any B'nai B'rith gatherings in the history of the lodge.

President Max Hopp opened the meeting with remarks relative to the Order and appealed to the ladies to interest their husbands and sons in the cause. Vocal and musical numbers were successfully carried out and proved a delight to the audience.

The guest of honor, President Bernstein, after being presented delivered a most forceful address.

In his remarks, he said that the motto of the Order, "Benevolence, brotherly love and harmony," was one of the things that link the brethren in so strong a compact. The Order has so many features to interest all Jews that it was no wonder that it holds the prestige that it does with the peoples of all civilized countries. He said that the charity given by the Order was the least important of its many channels of service. Greater than that of charity of the Order was the upbuilding of the character of the human race which the Order is so actively engaged in. He outlined the many phases of the service which is rendered by the individual members, stating in a clear manner the Big Brother and Big Sister movements, the work of the Anti-Defamation League, how the Order stretches out its hands for the fallen brother and brings him back to his loved ones and home. He said that the world owes an obligation to the Independent Order B'nai B'rith in checking the traffic of women, which never can be repaid.

In the afternoon they were shown the sights of the city. In the evening Brothers Mack and Loevinger were the principal speakers at a public meeting held under the auspices of the lodge. BRADFORD LODGE CARNIVAL.

A scene of gaiety and splendor was presented on the evening of February 7 when a large crowd gathered for a period of fun and frolic at the big charity carnival staged under the auspices of Bradford Lodge No. 745, of Bradford, Pa.

The interior of the big drill shed was elaborately decorated with national colors, American flags, pennants and streamers abounding while the triple color effect also shone from many electric bulbs. Ranged about the side and ends were booths for the sale of lemonade, ice cream, fancy china and glassware, cakes, candy, novelties and flowers. The ladies and girls in charge of the various booths did a rushing business.

In addition to the booths for the sale of useful and fancy articles, there was one where by crossing the palm of a fair clairvoyant with coin, the past, present and future were revealed at so much per revelation. Others had novel games as their principal feature.

Dancing numbers afforded entertainment for many, while amateur Charley Chaplins, supplied with raiment from the novelty booths, put on many of the funny capers for which the original is noted.

Members of the lodge and their lady friends were everywhere assisting in the reception of guests and relieving them of surplus funds in the name of sweet charity. As this was the purpose for which the majority attended the carnival, no strenuous efforts were necessary.

The carnival was in all respects one of the most successful functions, both socially and financially, which has been staged in the city and the promoters are entitled to much credit.

The principal purpose of the affair was the raising of funds for the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children, Erie, Pa.

Brother Sam Blumenthal read a paper on "The Jewish College Man". In a clear manner, he stated instances and personal observations, and greatly deplored the fact that the Jewish spirit of the average college man was very slack but very optimistically referred to the future—giving as instances the formation of a Congregation at Ann Arbor, Mich. A very spirited discussion ensued.

Announcement was made that the Lodge had accepted the invitation tendered by Mr. Becker, head worker of the Alliance to take care of four Sunday evening entertainments during the season.

Bros. Dr. Clifton H. Levy, Edward Sander and District Secretary Bernard M. Kaplan have been appointed a committee to revise the by-laws of Mount Sinai Lodge No. 2

Bro Bernard M Kaplan has been invited to preside over the Seder services on Passover eve in the large hall of the Young Women's Hebrew Association. The building, which is located on 110th St., between 5th and Lenox Aves., opposite the park and which is one of the finest buildings in the city, is unique in its character. It has a synagogue, a [illegible] educational classes, gymnasium and a dormitory with accommodations for 160 girls. The officers of the organization are Mrs. Israel Unterbery, Mrs. H. P. Mendes, Mrs. A. N. Cohen, Mrs. Felix N. Warburg, Mrs. S. Liebovitz and Mrs. Samuel I. Hyman. No effort is spared by these splendid women to give the girls every opportunity for mental, physical and spiritual development. The girls are surrounded by the best possible influences. There is an air of refinement and spirituality which permeates every activity in this wonderful institution. Secretary Bernard M. Kaplan spoke on patriotism at the religious services at this institution Friday evening, Feb. 23. Secretary Kaplan took occasion to point out that patriotism was one of the fundamental ideals of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith.

THE MENORAH MOVEMENT.

The Menorah Movement, represented by over 50 Menorah societies in American colleges and universities, held its annual convention at Minneapolis and St. Paul under the auspices of the University of Minnesota, on Dec. 26-29, 1916.

This Jewish student movement devoted to the "study and advancement of Jewish culture and ideals," initiated by a handful of students at Harvard in 1906, has grown rapidly and spontaneously until now, through its constituent societies in the leading universities of the country, it is a recognized force for intellectual and moral betterment.

In these momentous days, when the Jews of America are organizing their economic and spiritual resources to meet the obligations and responsibilities of leadership, it appears important to give more than a passing consideration to the aspirations and achievements of the Menorah Movement. With the advent of thousands of our numbers to the universities in the last two decades, followed by the prominence of Jewish students in the fields of scholarship, their awakening to a sense of loyalty and appreciation to their Jewish heritage has come a change of attitude from the old laissez-faire position. The Jewish students are slowly but unmistakably shaking off the old conception that the years of college life should be free and unperturbed of Jewish thoughts and problems. They are coming to the realization that their university training is incomplete and inadequate if it does not also give them an outlook on Jewish life, based upon a study of Jewish ideals and problems. With the new order being established among our university students, the men and women of the community are beginning to take a more active interest in moulding the welfare and progress of this student body, destined to exert no small influence upon the policies and development of American Jewry.

Aims and Purposes of the Menorah Societies.

The primary object of a Menorah society is intellectual and cultural. It inspires its men with a desire to study the history, the literature, the religion, the problems and ideals of the Jew. Working in entire harmony with the freedom and liberality of the American universities, it brings the Jewish historical and literary contribution out from the musty shelves of Semitic treasures and curios into the lecture room and study halls. By establishment of Menorah prizes and study groups, opportunities are given for earnest, intensive, fruitful endeavor in the fields of Jewish scholarship and thought.

A Menorah Society is instrumental in producing Jewish students with virile moral fibre, through the process of self-realization and reawakening that follows association with Menorah ideals. The feeling of shame and concealment, or even incongruity, is succeeded by the manly recognition of the Jewish heritage. There comes a spirit of reverence for the ideals and achievements of the Jewish past, a true appreciation of the problems of the present, and a spirit of consecration to serve for the future of the Jew. The spirit of class antagonism and snobbishness is often succeeded by a new attitude of more mutual understanding between the rich and the poor Jewish student, the orthodox and the reformed.

A Menorah society exerts a beneficent influence of a patriotic nature. In training its men for a harmonious adjustment of their American and Jewish loyalties—by inculcating in them a strong devotion to the ethical and social ideals which are at the foundation of our American democracy, it is preparing them for service to the state and to their fellow Jews. Our multiplying communal problems, our increasing measure of responsibility, calls for servants and leaders of the new generation who will combine an understanding of the deep underlying roots of American institutions with a warm devotion to the tradition and ideals of their Jewish heritage. This double function the Menorah societies are serving.

Results of Menorah Activity.

The Menorah society functions as a university agency. It has been a salutary force in its co-operation with university authorities for the general promotion of Jewish student welfare; it has done much to enlighten the general student body to a proper appreciation of the Jew, his contribution and ideals. Operating as a cultural force, an open forum, it has been accorded a position of dignity and respect. Its influence is ever widening in the field of Jewish scholarship, by encouraging and making possible at our leading universities the establishment of chairs and courses in Hebrew learning.

The attitude of university and faculty authorities is notably illustrated in the cordial support given by such leading educators as President Eliot of Harvard, President Wheeler of California, and President Hadley of Yale. The faculty members who have come into touch with the societies have noted the remarkable influence exerted by the Menorah idea. The observation of Prof. Edward C. Baldwin of the University of Illinois is but characteristic: "Even now I can see in the Jewish students whom I meet a change of mental attitude from that which was common a few years ago. The Jewish student of today seems to me to have developed a racial self-respect, not aggressive nor blatant, but rooted into a recognition that he belongs to a gifted race possessed of a splendid past. The Jewish student now is more commonly a man proud of his heritage, and sensible of his obligation to live in the light of his racial ideals. Such a change of mental attitude I attribute in no small degree to the influence of the Menorah Movement."

The Jewish community, too, is beginning to feel the influence of the Menorah societies. Whether in the fields of Jewish education, social service, community enterprises, Menorah graduates are being actively enrolled, while the under-graduates are receiving that academic training in Jewish lore and ideals which makes them ideal candidates for these fields of pursuit. The Menorah Movement, with a membership of 3,000 Jewish students, with an ever-increasing body of university and non-university men and women in the general community associating themselves with the movement, may confidently be expected to contribute in no small measure to the progress and advancement of the Jew in America. The Jewish student generation, aroused and mindful of its obligation and opportunity, will give a creditable accounting for itself.

THE POPULATION OF WARSAW.

According to the census lately published, there were on the 1st of March, 1916, 984,604 inhabitants in the City of Warsaw, of whom 351,521 were Jews, who thus formed considerably over a third of the population.

Be Thou a Blessing

Address by

DR. RUDOLPH I. COFFEE

Director Social Service Work, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, at District Grand Lodge No. 1 Convention, Buffalo, N. Y., February 4, 1917.

Mr. President and Brethren:

To you all, old members and those just initiated into our Order, I bring a message from our beloved President in Chicago and the Executive Committee. I shall tell you of the work we have been doing, the ideals for which we stand, and the plans which we intend, with God's help, to carry out.

As you are well aware, the Independent Order B'nai B'rith was organized in this country seventy-three years ago. During these past years we have instituted asylums for the orphans, hospitals for the sick, and homes for the aged. Recently, the Order started upon a new and most needed work. It asks you not only to give of your money, but yourselves. The Order asks not so much for your purse, as for your personality. It wishes your time, your energy, your devotion and your zeal. This afternoon, fifty men joined as members of our Order. I hope not one of you expects to win honor, or glory, or position, or money, or any other material gain. You came here not to obtain but to give. We call upon you at this hour to join the greatest army the world has ever known and become a blessing to mankind. This army was first called into being when the divine word was spoken to Abraham—Haya B'rocho—"Be thou a blessing". This army was given its immortal mission when Moses demanded that Pharoah release the Children of Israel from galling slavery. They left the land of Egypt to enjoy the pleasures of life, with independence and freedom for all. This army aims not to shoot a human being, but to prolong and sweeten life. Its weapon is not the musket which kills, but the spirit of God which uplifts. This army is to fight, not man, our brother, but to wage war on sin, disease, ignorance and poverty. We would enrich life and banish poverty, that disgrace of civilized times.

How can the B'nai B'rith become a blessing? What can we, as individuals, do? I answer, in two ways. We can help our less fortunate brethren to become the best possible Israelites and Americans, by assisting them to economic independence. Then, we can bless our country by combatting those serious evidences of race prejudice, which hurt Judaism and lower American ideals. Let us consider this latter aspect first.

Anti-Defamation League.

This refers to the remarkable activities of our Anti-Defamation League. Every week the committee meets, receiving reports from some two hundred cities all over the country. Few people realize the great work already accomplished. In 1915 there were sixteen so-called Hebrew comedians on the vaudeville stage, shaming us with their vulgarities. Our Order was determined that Jews should not be thus insulted and today the theatrical board has been practically swept clean of that nuisance.

Another angle of the Anti-Defamation League is illustrated by the following story, which appeared in a Southern weekly. A man insured his store for $10,000 and that night the store burned down. Naturally, the insurance company was suspicious and had a detective investigate the matter. He reported that a spark from a passing railroad engine caused the conflagration. Thereupon the company paid $10,000, but sent the following letter. "Enclosed find check for $10,000 covering your insurance. We cannot help noting that your insurance policy went into effect on Monday at noon, and the fire took place at 6 o'clock the same evening. Wherefore the delay"?

I knew that story would produce laughter, but suppose I add that the newspaper named the man Abraham Levy, a second-hand clothier. Now you feel the danger of that article. As soon as the League heard of it, immediate inquiry was made to locate its source. That harmful story was stopped just in time, otherwise it would have been syndicated to over two hundred newspapers in all parts of the country. Why must the world be told that the Jews start fires? It is untrue as the actual facts prove. The newspaper man said he meant no harm. It was a good story. When told that such needless references to Jews increase prejudice, he immediately changed the name of the storekeeper to John Smith, one with no Jewish significance.

Many of you men are fathers. Perhaps your own children have read the nursery rhyme:

> "Jack sold his eggs
> To the rogue of a Jew
> Who cheated him out
> Of half of his due".

The League objects to kindergarten children being taught that Jews are cheats, and called this to the publisher's attention. He stopped the sale of the book at once, and promised to publish a new edition omitting that couplet. So I could narrate many instances of the very fine work of the Anti-Defamation League. However, time will permit but two further illustrations.

I want to tell you about two men, neither of whom ever lived, whose names have done infinite harm to Jews and Judaism. The first is Shylock, in the "Merchant of Venice". The Independent Order B'nai B'rith, co-operating with other Jewish societies, feels that beautiful as is the play, it does not belong in the curriculum of the High Schools of America, and for two reasons. First, the average High School teacher is not qualified to teach and explain this piece. Second, the average pupil is too immature to grasp the subtleties of this magnificent play.

Shakespeare very likely never saw a Jew. They had been driven out of England in 1290, and not until almost fifty years after Shakespeare had died, did Oliver Cromwell permit the Jews to return. Shakespeare caricatured the Jew to amuse people. The theaters of his day catered to the public, even as they do today. For them, this drama was turned into a comedy, and that delightful fifth act was added. The production is untrue to Jewish life. The name of Shylock is surely not Jewish. He stands before the world as a money grabber. Yet, in the play Shylock refused his money, and later declined twice the amount. Shylock wanted revenge. Wrong again. What true Jew has ever longed for revenge? For centuries we have been attacked and persecuted for killing the Jew of Nazareth. Yet, when did the Jews ever seek or demand revenge? For the past sixteen years there has been pogrom after pogrom in Russia. When did the voice of a Jew cry out for revenge? Justice has been our request and our plea. Justice is the corner stone of our religion. We seek justice from mankind. When this terrible war, for example, will end, the B'nai B'rith will use its utmost means to secure justice for all Jewish residents in the warring zone.

Not knowing Jews, Shakespeare did not understand our people. Having never seen a Jewish home, he committed the unthinkable error of making Jessica dishonorably leave her father's home. The most rabid anti-Semite has never denied the wonderful moral influence of the inner Jewish home life. Being ignorant of history, Shakespeare made Shylock approach the court of Venice for justice. No Jew had rights before the courts in the Middle Ages. Had a Jew actually appealed for justice, he would have lost his life. In demanding his pound of flesh, Shylock is made a cruel monster. How very untrue is this to all Jewish traditions and customs. Judaism breathes kindness in every act of life. The Jewish method of slaughter is a model of kindness and humanity, even to animals. So far as Jews are concerned, there never was need for a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Studying this pound of flesh story we discover that it came not from the history of Israel, but from Rome. It was part of Shakespeare's supreme genius to collect data from all quarters of the world and weave the material into a rounded whole. Historical accuracy does not affect a plot. "Black Beauty" never lived, yet this book changed our attitude toward dumb animals. Edward Everett Hale assured us that Philip Nolan is a creation of his imagination, still "The Man Without a Country" ranks among our best juvenile books. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is pure fiction, yet it precipitated the Civil War. Similarly, the pound of flesh plot was incorporated into a Jewish play, though utterly foreign to all Jewish life, and has ever since tremendously impressed the non-Jewish mind. It was customary to conclude the Roman banquet with the special course of a live pig, which was brought in on a large platter. From this living pig each guest was supposed to slice his special portion. Shakespeare drew from this custom for the "Merchant of Venice". Most unhappily has this scene re-acted on our people, for the world associates it with Jews and Jewish life.

How many High School teachers impart such information to their pupils, and tell the truth concerning the Jews? Either the play should be taught properly or should be left for the college curriculum where students can investigate the facts for themselves.

Let me conclude this part of my address with another illustration. You have all seen the wonderful production called "The Birth of a Nation". Last winter, the producer of this magnificent film went to Los Angeles and started work on a religious play which would be better as a money-maker than the political play. He chose as his theme the closing days in the life of Jesus. One scene was particularly offensive. This shows Jesus arrested by Jews, dragged to court by Jews, his gown torn by a Jew, and his face slapped by a Jew. That play was to portray to a hundred million citizens that the Jews killed Jesus, granting that he was a historical person. You know and I know that the Jews did not put Jesus to death, but Christians generally believe it. Realizing the religious prejudice this would arouse, the B'nai B'rith communicated with the management. A representative from New York visited our Chicago office and we convinced him that modern Christian scholars, both in America and Europe, now recognize that not the Jews, but the Romans, had killed Jesus. For example Jesus was crucified. In the Hebrew language, even to this day, there is no word for crucifixion. According to the Bible, there are four methods for putting a man to death—stoning, strangulation, sword and fire. Such a procedure was exceptionally rare. Rabbi Akiba termed that Sanhedrin "a bloody court", which put one man to death in seventy years. Jesus died by none of the above methods. He was crucified, the Roman mode of putting a man to death. Again, the Talmud tells us that Rome closed all Jewish courts in Palestine, one hundred years before the destruction of the Temple and substituted her own courts. Jesus was tried fifty years later. According to the Talmudic law, if a man is arrested, he must not be tried on the eve of a holiday. The hour is too holy to commence a criminal trial. If the man is convicted and sentenced to die, he must not be put to death at once. A period of time must elapse. Perhaps new evidence will be found to acquit him. Finally, on "erav-yontif", the day before a festival, no man may be put to death. Yet, according to Christian teaching, we find Jesus arrested, tried, convicted and crucified, all on the day before Passover, or as one Gospel says, on Passover day. From no scientific viewpoint can it be proved that the Jews killed Jesus. I tell you men that if our Order did nothing else in 1916 than stop this dangerous film, it deserves the membership of every Jew in Buffalo. Thus is our Order combatting religious prejudice in America.

Social Service Department.

Now, I proceed to the positive side of our work, and shall show what we are doing to overcome poverty. This is through the agency of the Social Service Department, instituted at the Constitution Grand Lodge, in San Francisco, May, 1915. In the first place, we aim to set the Jewish boy on the right road toward manhood. There is too much juvenile delinquency in America, and our Order wishes to reduce Jewish cases to a minimum. How can we help? Through the Big Brother Movement. After years of careful study the Big Brother Movement has been called the most successful method of reducing delinquency. In New York 96 per cent of the boys paroled through the Big Brother Movement never returned to the court. In Boston, the percentage was 97 per cent. Among Jewish folk, the figure should be even higher. This great work is now being taken over by our Order on a national scale. We ask our lodges to organize the Big Brother Movement in their several cities. If a Jewish boy is brought before the judge, let him be paroled to a Big Brother so that he receives another opportunity, and not a sentence to some reformatory. I could tell you stories all afternoon of the fine and really creditable work which our Order has accomplished under the influence of the Big Brother Movement.

Big Brother Cases.

Just permit me here to narrate two typical cases. The very first case brought to our attention in November, 1915, was Max. At the age of 13 his father had refused him a new pair of shoes on a bitter cold day. The boy, unable to attend school because of a snow storm, took two dollars from his mother's purse, bought the shoes and went to school. For this, his father had him brought before the Juvenile Court and Max was sent to the Reform School. Two years later, on his release, his father, after a bitter quarrel, had Max returned to the court. Judge Pinckney, unwilling to re-commit the lad, asked if we would not give Max a Big Brother. Mr. C., a member of our Order, was appointed, and to this day has personal charge of him. Max was at once removed from his father's home and lodged at the Deborah Boy's Club. He was provided with a position, sent to night school, given a card of admission to a local gymnasium and went Friday evenings with his Big Brother to Temple. Soon after, his salary was raised. Later on, his responsibility was increased. Six months after the father had assured me that the boy was "an American loafer", this lad had absolutely made good. Today he is a splendid young man of clean habits and very popular among his friends. The Big Brother Movement saved that boy. Not five pennies were spent on Max. The Big Brother gave his time, his personality and his effort. Money is the last thing to give the boy. He needs guidance and advice.

The second case is quite different. Abraham lost his parents in a Russian pogrom. His relatives were indifferent, and at the age of 14 he had run away to Hamburg, from which city he set sail as a stowaway on a vessel bound for New Orleans. For two years, he visited the large cities of the East. In Denver he was arrested as a pickpocket thief and committed to the Reform School. Last July, I visited Denver, and with members of the local Social Service Committee, went to the State Reform School. The Superintendent said that Abraham was his worst inmate, absolutely incorrigible. Conversation with the boy disclosed that

7. Deutero-Isaiah, the Leader as Prophet-Theologian.

Through the ages, perplexed humanity has been crying, in the words of Moses: "Show me Thy glory". Through its sciences and philosophies, it has tried to solve the baffling riddle of existence, to lift the veil of mystery from life, and to decipher the hieroglyphs, the sacred writings, on nature's pages. But beyond the finger-prints of the Divine in the life of the universe and of man, it has not been able to fully scan even a fragment of God's majesty. The eye of man cannot see, and the ear of man cannot hear. These fleshy instruments of mortal man are too weak to gaze upon the strong light of the Eternal King, in His beauty, or to hear the sounds of His voice, at the might of which the earth and its foundations tremble.

Longing to behold the invisible source of their life, and yearning to enter into communion with God, men, both savage and civilized, have sought to adore Him and to give concrete expression to their ideas about Him. These impulses toward God, though of the noblest kind, nevertheless often assumed idolatrous forms. The symbol was often confused with the idea it was supposed to represent, the external side of the ritual with its spiritual and moral aim. The religious leaders of Israel, therefore, regarded it as their chief task to remove the veil of heathenism that obscured the spiritual vision of God from the eyes of their fellowmen. Rising to the high rocks of reality, these men of genius discerned that all that mortal man can see of God is but the passing train of His glory: His laws of justice and love that hold the world together, but not His holy presence itself. He, the Infinite, can only be invoked as King, Judge, Loving Father; and can be worshiped in the spirit of truth and righteousness. In the teachings of Elijah, Amos, Hosea, Micah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, religion found its clearest expression. It was brought into relation with every side of life, and cast its beneficent light upon the darkest phases of existence, dispelling doubt, fear, sorrow, and misery. It was left to the great prophet of the exile, to weave one garland out of all their flowers of lofty sentiment, for the adoration of God; to unite the single melodies of the Jewish soul into one grand symphony of praise to God; to construct out of the broken rays of light about God and His relation to nature and to mankind, a consistent and explicit theory: to cast the views imbedded in the religious consciousness of the people and their leaders, into a clear system of theology.

The modern man's horror of the bare shadow of dogma and obsolete church doctrine accounts for the disrepute of the very name of theology. Once the proud mistress of all the sciences, it is now suspected, and seldom admitted into their imposing presence. However, men of true knowledge are not wanting, who, in the understanding of the differences between the pretense and the truth of a [illegible] and between the use and the [illegible] of a scientific method, recognize in theology a sincere attempt to catch a glimpse of the passing train of God's glory, worthy of an honored place in the counsel of the sciences.

In every age, theology has turned to the history of mankind, and to the physical sciences for its materials, and to philosophy for the methods of its search after religious truth. With the expansion of history, and with the radical transformations of the sciences and the philosophies, the contents and the nature of theology, too, have changed. But the theology of Deutero-Isaiah has survived all changes, and still is one of the rarest jewels of religious thought and artistic beauty. The words of Isaac Disraeli, spoken in another connection, apply to Deutero-Isaiah: In the enthusiasm of this genius, the science of his day became imagination; and the philosophy, poetry.

The true theologian, as the true poet and prophet reproduces the religious thought of the past, in order to hold it up as a torch for those who grovel in the night of the living present, ever calling:

Behold the former things are come to pass,
And new things do I declare;
Before they spring forth, I tell you of them.
(Isaiah xlii:9-10.)

Deutero-Isaiah advanced his theology in response to the cry of the tortured Jewish soul for light and for [illegible]on.

Years had passed since the reassuring voice of the prophet-priest Ezekiel had been heard. The night of the exile was dark. The captives' hearts were heavy with grief, and crushed by oppression. Ezekiel and other chosen spirits had taught them to behold the presence of God in their midst, to draw comfort from it and to sing God's song of hope even in the land of their captivity. But their tear-dimmed eyes failed to see the arch of God's eternal promise. Many of the wealthy ones among them were drawn into the busy life and commerce of Babylonia, and grew to love their guilded cage. The poor exiles that were impressed into state service, on the elaborate buildings of Nebuchadnezzar, in their anguish of spirit, lost all hope of brighter days. Indeed a small remnant waited patiently for the restoration of their suffering nation in Palestine. But it all seemed so far off. The overwhelming sorrow that filled their hearts found expression in the immortal Psalm, 137:

By the rivers of Babylon—
There we sat down; yea, we wept
When we remembered Zion.
Upon the willows in the midst thereof,
We hanged our harps.
For there, they that held us captive, asked of us words of song;
And our tormentors asked of us mirth:
"Sing us one of the songs of Zion".
How shall we sing the Lord's song
In a foreign land?
If I forget thee, O Jerusalem,
Let my right hand forget her cunning;
Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth,
If I remember thee not,
If I set not Jerusalem
Above my chiefest joy.

At the thought of their holy city, the stream of their gladness ran dry. Their whole fatherland was a cemetery of their dead ambitions. Their brethren that remained in Palestine lived in misery and in abject poverty. The land, once the beauty of the whole earth, the princess among the nations, was now the fit theme for Lamentations. The nation was still a heap of dry bones. Its greater part was losing its will to live as a nation, its faith in itself and in its future. It felt itself torn away not only from its home land, but also from the God of Israel.

"The rank and file of a people", says Dubnov, "are instructed by revolutions and catastrophies better than by sermons". At the impending crash of their tormentor, Babylon, the hope of the Jews began to soar high. As the light began to pierce the darkness, a voice, sounding like the hallelujah chorus of angels, dispelled the gloom from the hearts of the Jewish captives, by heralding the dawn of a new day.

Who was this messenger of good tidings is unknown to us. Not even his name has come down to posterity. But what of that! Said Carlyle: "The work an unknown good man has done is like a vein of water flowing hidden under ground, secretly making the ground green; it flows and flows, it joins itself to other veins and veinlets; one day, it will start forth as a visible perennial well". In the history of Israel, a place of honor is reserved for the great unknown men who built up Judaism as the coral reef in mid-ocean. Among them are statesmen and lawgivers, sages and Psalmists, priests and prophets. Though they left no memorial, their righteousness shall endure forever. The words of the great unknown prophet of the exile have been on the lips of Jew and Gentile for over twenty-five centuries. His tender accents, more than those of any other man, have healed the wounded and comforted the bereaved. Like the dew that refreshes the withered grass and wakens the fading flowers to life, so his words have revived the faint hearts and roused the drooping spirits of men and of nations.

The very existence of this man who sang himself into the hearts of humanity had been forgotten for over two thousand years. At an early date his writings were appended to the roll of Isaiah's sermons; and, in the course of time, were mistakenly ascribed to the illustrious prophet of Jerusalem, who preached about a century and a half earlier. Through the painstaking labors of modern Biblical scholarship, the prophecies of this unknown author have been distinguished from Isaiah's. As his real name is not recorded, and as his words stand next to Isaiah's in our Bible, modern scholars call him the Second or Deutero-Isaiah, or Isaiah of Babylon.

In our constellation of stars, he shines with the brightest. As poet, he has but few equals in the world's literature. Such breadth of vision and majestic sweep of rhetoric, such brilliance of expression and wealth of melody, God has not granted to many mortals. The song of the angels cannot be sweeter or purer. He combines the elegance and sublimity of Isaiah, the lyric exquisiteness of Jeremiah, and the artistry of Ezekiel's visions into his impassioned song of joy and of hope. The spirit of the first Isaiah lived in him. As Matthew Arnold observes: "There was the same irresistible eloquence, the same elate emotion, the same puissance of faith and joy. Isaiah was his inspirer among the prophets, his parent source, his only equal" (Isaiah of Jerusalem, p. 3). He gathered the luminous thoughts of his predecessors into his great soul. He combined the plea of Amos for justice, and of Hosea for loving kindness, Isaiah's belief in the holiness of God, and the salvation of the nation through the faithful remnant ("She'ar Yashub"), Jeremiah's message of the inwardness of faith (or the religion of the heart), and Ezekiel's bright vision of Israel's national revival for the sake of the glorification of God's name. These he mingled with the strivings and sorrows of his people; and produced, in the light of the catastrophic changes in the political world of his day, a profound unified system of religious thought, which is even more remarkable than his poetry. His theology is not the product of cold intellect. Heart and mind, love and reason worked together, in producing his system of pure spiritual light. No wonder, then, that his "voice has carried farthest". The fifteen chapters (Isaiah XL-LV) which most scholars agree in ascribing to him, have been characterized as "the most brilliant jewel of prophetic literature". (See Budde, Religion of Israel to the Exile; Cornill, The Prophets of Israel; C. Montefiore in his Hibbert Lectures, following Cheyne, claims Isaiah LVII:15-21; LX-LXI for Deutero-Isaiah; Cheyne, in his later writings, takes XLIX-LV to be "an appendix to the original Prophecy of Restoration, written in Babylonia by an admirer of the Second Isaiah, and brought to Jerusalem"—(Jewish Religious Life after the Exile, p. 22. See also G. A. Smith, The Book of Isaiah, Vol. II.) They are a veritable symphony in words, at once one of the most perfect and the most profound literary treasures in the Bible.

Deutero-Isaiah "begins where the pre-exilic prophets left off" (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures, p. 265). They had addressed themselves to Israel as a corrupt political unit, and had called for repentance, for purer standards of national life. Deutero-Isaiah, like Ezekiel, spoke to Israel as a crushed band of exiles in Babylonia, where from a political nation it was transformed into a religious congregation. Hence the difference in the tone of his message! Instead of denouncing the people's injustice and over-weaning self-confidence, he strove to re-awaken in their despondent hearts new faith in God's justice and new hope in their national future. "The Lord God hath given me," he declared, "a skilled tongue that I should know how to sustain, with words, him that is weary" (L: 4).

The first note of this poem is struck in these thrilling words:

Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people,
Saith your God.
Bid Jerusalem take heart,
And proclaim unto her,
That her time of service is accomplished,
That her guilt is paid off,
That she hath received of the Lord's

"'God's cause of righteousness, which erewhile could only be made manifest in judgment, must now be expressed in salvation." (Montefiore, Ibid.) What emboldened the prophet to announce good tidings to Zion, in this jubilant strain, was the revelation of Divine glory in the events of the day. In the far distant mountains of Elam, at the head of the Persian Gulf, the heroic King Cyrus rose in power and asserted fast his sovereignty in the neighboring lands. The ambitious conqueror of Media, Persia, and Lydia, was about to become the Lord of Babylonia. To the keen observer, it was evident that the triumph of this prince, who was distinguished for his religious tolerance, meant the realization of Israel's dream of a national restoration in Palestine. In his firm belief that all history is but the unfoldment of God's plan of salvation for all humanity, in which Israel was assigned a leading part, Deutero-Isaiah hailed Cyrus as the instrument through which God would bring His will to pass. And he acclaimed Cyrus as God's annointed—the Moshiah—God's own shepherd.

Thus saith the Lord to His annointed,
To Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden,
To subdue nations before him,
And to surrender kings to him (literally: to loose the loins of kings),
To open the doors before him,
And to shut no gates.
I myself will go before thee,
And make the rugged places plain;
I will break in pieces the gates of brass,
And cut in sunder the bars of iron;
And I will give thee the treasures of darkness
And the hidden riches of secret places,
That thou mayest know that I am the Lord,
Who call thee by thy name, even the God of Israel.
For the sake of Jacob my servant, and
 Israel mine elect,
I have called thee by thy name;
I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known Me.

The Babylonians worshiped many gods. And the Persians, of whom Cyrus was now king, believed that the world was ruled by two divine potentates—one the god of light and of all good, and the other a Satanic being, the god of darkness and evil. Denying these claims, the prophet, with greater emphasis than his predecessors, calls out that there is but one living God and none besides Him, who both forms light and creates darkness, who makes peace and also creates evil. He is the only uncreated Creator of the whole universe, the guardian and leader of the destinies of man. If, then, Cyrus is girded with strength, it is not because the idols helped him, but because the God of heaven and earth, the Holy One of Israel, has singled him out as the instrument of His will, to say to Jerusalem, "Thou shalt be rebuilt!" and to the temple, "Thy foundations shall be laid". (XLIV: 28-XLV: 7).

Behold (calls the prophet), the Lord
 God will come as a Mighty One,
And His arm will rule for Him,
Behold His reward is with Him,
And His recompense before Him.
As a shepherd, He feeds His flock;
He gathers the lambs in His arm,
And carries them in His bosom,
And gently leadeth those that suckle
 young. (XL: 10-11.)

These words sounded like a voice from the grave to the crushed captives; and they must have turned a deaf ear to them. Hence the prophet accused the people of being men of little faith, who judge God by narrow human standards. In their spiritual blindness they imagine God to be like the idols fashioned by human hands out of wood. He proceeds to picture, in sarcastic terms, the process of manufacturing an idol, and of carrying it around for the purpose of worship. In so doing, he like Elijah, in the case of Baal, ridiculed idolatry out of existence. The lifeless piece of wood to which the people bow down is indeed dull and helpless. But how different is God! Who can fathom His greatness? Who can grasp the full meaning of His omnipotence? Enthroned is He above the circle of the earth; and its inhabitants are as grasshoppers before Him. He stretches out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in. Lo, nations are to Him but as a drop from a bucket, and like dust in a balance are they reckoned. To whom, then, will you liken God? All nature reveals His creative powers.

Lift up your eyes on high
And behold Him that createth these!
He bringeth out their host by number;
He calleth them all by name;
By the greatness of His might,
And for that He is strong in power,
Not one faileth. (XL: 26.)

And God who is the life of the universe and the guiding spirit of human destiny can be trusted. His hand is not too short to help.

Why, then (concludes the prophet), sayest thou, O Jacob,
And speakest, O Israel,
"My way is hid from the Lord,
And my right is passed over from my God"?
Hast thou not known?
Hast thou not heard
That the everlasting God is the Lord,
The Creator of the ends of the earth?
He fainteth not, neither is he weary.
Unsearchable is His understanding.
He giveth power to the faint;

And to him that hath no might, He increaseth strength.
Though youths shall faint and be weary,
And young men shall utterly fall,
They that wait for the Lord, shall renew their strength;
They shall mount up with wings as eagles,
They shall run and not be weary,
They shall walk, and not faint. (XL.)

In the light of the revelation of God in the lives of men, as announced by the prophets, the suffering of the nation appeared in a new light. The collapse of the nation came to pass, in accord with God's plan of justice. "Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers?" asks Deutero-Isaiah; and finds his ready answer:

Did not the Lord?
He against whom we have sinned,
And in whose ways they would not walk;
Neither were they obedient to His law.
Therefore, He poured upon them the fury of his anger,
And the strength of battle.
(XLII: 24-25.)

But God's justice is not only punitive; it is also redemptive. He punishes when His eternal laws are broken; but He also saves and delivers. Hence, the prophet calls unto his people, in the name of God:

Fear not, for I have redeemed thee,
I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine.
When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee;
And through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee;
When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned,
Neither shall the flames kindle upon thee. . . .
I will bring thy seed from the East,
And gather thee from the West.
I will say to the North, "Give up",
And to the South, "Keep not back,
Bring my sons from afar,
And my daughters from the ends of the earth". (XLIII: 1-7.)

And the ransomed of the Lord shall return,
And come with singing unto Zion,
And everlasting joy shall be upon their heads;
They shall obtain gladness and joy,
And sorrow and sighing shall flee away.
(LI: 11.)

And what will be the future of the restored nation? The prophets were not contented with a mere continuation of national existence. In the life of nations, as in the life of the individual, they looked for a goal. All history, as they saw it, moved to the one great event when all heathen nations that are steeped in idolatry would turn to the living God. This was the dream of Isaiah and of Micah, which they expressed in that remarkable vision of all nations going to the Mountain of the Lord, to the House of the God of Jacob, there to break their swords into plow-shares, and to be guided by the word of God. This hope of a Messianic era runs through Jeremiah's (Jer. XVI: 19) and Ezekiel's preaching, and reaches its culmination in the prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah. His broad view of the world-history led him to believe that each nation occupies a place assigned to it by Providence. In the Divine order, it appeared to him, Israel was singled out to be the Messiah of the nations, the prophet-people unto mankind, the servant of God. Israel shall not live on the sword, as the other nations do. As the servant nation of God, Israel shall be meek and gentle, and thus exemplify the Divine truth in life, and bring light and freedom to the world (XLII: 1-7).

Formulating the mission of Israel as one of service in the cause of pure religion and morality, it became clear to the prophet why his people had received double at the hand of the Lord for their sins. The parent bears the sorrows of the child; the true teacher carries the doubts and questionings of his pupils in his mind; the king that is worthy of his high calling carries the burdens of his subjects; God Himself carries the needs and the griefs of mankind. Just as the individual prophet is exposed to hardship in the midst of his people, so is it the lot of Israel, the prophet-nation, to suffer in the midst of a heathen world. But even as the individual prophet, through his endurance amid tribulations, plants the seeds of spiritual truth among his people, so Israel, through a life of martyrdom, will ultimately implant the knowledge of God in the hearts of humanity (LII: 13-15). And the nations themselves that once oppressed Israel will one day confess:

Surely our diseases he did bear, and our pains he carried;
Whereas we did esteem him stricken,
Smitten of God and afflicted.
But he was wounded because of our transgressions,
He was crushed because of our iniquities.
The chastisement of our welfare was upon him,
And with his stripes, we were healed.
All we, like sheep, did go astray;
We turned every one to his own way;
And the Lord hath made to light on him
The iniquity of us all.
He was oppressed, though he humbled himself
And opened not his mouth;
As a lamb is led to the slaughter,
And as a sheep that before her shearers is dumb,
Yea, he opened not his mouth. . . .
Yet it pleased the Lord to crush him by disease,
To see if his soul would offer itself in restitution,
That he might see his seed, prolong his days,
And that the purpose of the Lord might prosper in his hand
(LIII: 4-7; 10.)

The suffering of Israel will not crush him. It will but strengthen him for his world-mission.

No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper;
And every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment, thou shalt condemn.
This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord,
And their due reward from Me, saith the Lord. (LIV: 17.)

If, as a modern statesman has said: "It is not what a nation gains, but what it gives, that makes it great", no more glorious ideal was ever formed for any nation than that of Deutero-Isaiah for Israel. The prophets were unsparing critics of their people's vices. At first, the negative element of denunciation, appears to have predominated in their exhortations; but a deeper insight into their work brings their positive ideal to full light. Says Dubnov: "Like a flaming torch carried through dense darkness, they cast a glaring light upon the vices of society, at the same time illuminating the path that leads upward to the goal of the ethical ideal". Their criticism was not confined to the social evils of the day. They went to the root of things: to the people's religious ideals. "They realized that alien influences and the low grade of intelligence possessed by the masses were not the sole causes of the frequent backslidings of the people. The Jewish doctrine itself bore within it the germ of error. The two chief pillars of the old faith—the nationalizing of the God-idea, and the stress laid upon the cult, the ceremonial side of religion, as compared with the moral requirements—were, first and foremost, to be held responsible for the Judaism". The prophets, therefore, bent their energies upon the exalted task of universalizing the God-idea and ethicizing the cult. Through their instruction, God became acknowledged as the Father of all nations, who demands moral conduct from all men, Jew and non-Jew alike. Though each nation has its role to play in the unfolding history of humanity, all nations are equal in their obligation to do righteousness. Through these exalted views about God and His relation to mankind, the idea of Israel, too, was refined. Instead of being the chosen people in the sense of the favorite of God (as described in Deuteronomy VII: 6-8), Israel came to be looked upon as the God-choosing and the God-serving nation. "Here", writes Dubnov, "is the origin of the great idea of the spiritual 'Messianism' of the Jewish people, or better, its 'Missionism', an eternal idea, far more comprehensive than the old idea of national election, which it supplanted". (Jewish History, pp. 63-67.) Here we have the beginning of the age-long conflict between higher and lower Jewish nationalism which continues to this day. The prophetic ideal shines with undiminished light for us of today. Israel must still continue—despite all trials—to hold out the imperishable light of spiritual truth, to a world wrapped in darkness. Zangwill has remarked that "To suffer two thousand years for an idea is a privilege that has been accorded only to Israel—'the Soldier of God'. That were no tragedy, but a heroic epic, even as the prophet Isaiah had prefigured. The true tragedy, the saddest sorrow, lay in the martyrdom of an Israel unworthy of his sufferings".

In the prophets, the spirit of Israel became flesh. As in Palestine, so in lands far away, they beheld the presence of God, and sang their song of faith and of hope. Living in captivity, Ezekiel dreamed of the national resurrection of Israel; and Deutero-Isaiah of Israel's vocation, of Israel's place in history. The ideal commonwealth of Ezekiel, aiming to establish a kingdom in which the priests were to be the rulers and the Temple with its sacrifices to form the center, could be realized only in Palestine. Deutero-Isaiah's ideal of Israel as a prophet-nation, as the servant of God, while also centering in the national restoration in Palestine, could remain Israel's beacon light throughout the stormy centuries of raging hatred amid seas of trouble in all lands. It gave a meaning of our suffering and a purpose to our existence. To our brethren who still bear the burden of oppression, in lands of intolerance, the words of this great prophet bring healing balm. And to all Israel, whether bond or free, his discussions of the nature, spirituality and unity of God, of the suffering of the righteous, and of the philosophy of history, are of momentous significance. His broad spirit of universalism was vocalized and revocalized by Yehudah Halevi and the other poets of the Synagogue, and, with new emphasis, by the leaders of the Reform Movement. It is the dominant note in our old as well as in our new prayer-books, reaching its climax in our devotions for Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur, and in the Adoration Prayer which crowns all our services. The stirring notes of this nameless prophet-theologian still ring with undiminished fervor, calling unto mankind:

Look unto Me, and be ye saved,
All the ends of the earth,
For I am God, and there is none else.
By Myself have I sworn,
That unto Me every knee shall bow,
And every tongue shall swear.
(XLV: 22-23.)

His notes of comfort bring solace to all hearts:

For the mountains may depart,
And the hills be removed,
But My kindness shall not depart from thee,
Neither shall the covenant of peace be removed,
Saith the Lord, that hath compassion on thee. (LIV: 10.)

MENORAH LODGE OF BALTIMORE REPLIES TO EDITORIAL CRITICISM BY DR. ROSENAU.

Editor of "Jewish Comment":

Sir: Please be advised that Menorah Lodge, I. O. B. B., does not compete with the Federated Charities in any manner. We solicit no funds. Quite the reverse. We contribute to local charities as well as to many outside the state. In fact nearly all of our dues are expended in the charitable and educational works for which the Order is deservedly noted.

The recent editorial of Dr. Rosenau was decidedly inopportune, glaringly at variance with what the Order really stands for and, if unchallenged, would seriously misrepresent us.

The Menorah Building, 2106 Eutaw Place, is a home for the Lodge and will not seriously interfere with Dr. Rosenau's pet hobby, the building which he is sponsor for. If he objects to the Menorah Building, why not object to the Phoenix Club and the Clover Club and all the other clubs and lodges in Baltimore? And to be really consistent, why not object to his Community Building also?

The B'nai B'rith needs no justification and merits no criticism. It has recently contributed substantial amounts to the Betsy Levy Home and the Hebrew Orphan Asylum and means to increase these subscriptions to the utmost limits of its available funds.

The existence of a Lodge which has for its avowed objects the following—"uniting Israelites in the work of promoting their highest interests and those of humanity; of developing, elevating and defending the mental and moral character of our race; of inculcating the purest principles of philanthropy, honor and patriotism; of supporting science and art; alleviating the wants of the poor and needy; visiting and attending the sick; coming to the rescue of victims of persecution; providing for, protecting and assisting the widow and orphan on the broadest principles of humanity"—may not be lightly criticised.

SOLOMON MENDELS.

Feb. 12, 1917.

JEWISH COMMUNITY ORGANIZED AT BARCELONA, SPAIN.

Dr. A. S. Yahuda, professor of Hebrew literature at the Madrid University, has succeeded in founding a Jewish community at Barcelona. The community has been legally recognized by the local authorities, and he is taking the necessary steps for obtaining Government approval to the community he has been instrumental in establishing in Madrid. Dr. Yahuda states that a Sepher Torah has been obtained from the congregation of Bayonne, France, which was taken there by the refugees from Spain who fled from the terrors of the Inquisition in 1492. He thinks the Sepher originally belonged to the synagogue of Vittoria in Northern Spain, because almost the entire Bayonne community was composed of those who escaped from that town. He adds the most interesting fact that even as late as the middle of last century several of the Jewish families in Bayonne still treasured the keys of their ancestors' houses in Vittoria.

SIG. LIVINGSTON, CHAIRMAN OF ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE, DEFINES PREJUDICE.

Prejudice is a disease. It is an abnormal condition of the human mind. Like all other derangement of the brain, it is difficult to diagnose and more difficult to correct. It is more malignant and more contagious than any other affliction of mankind.

It has infested the human mind from infancy. It is handed down from generation to generation. It afflicts the patient in all stages of life, from early childhood to old age.

The old and the young, the strong and the feeble, the educated and the illiterate —none are exempt.

It enters the mansion of the mighty and the hovel of the peasant. It dethrones reason, embitters the heart, and turns into venom the milk of human kindness. It hardens the arteries of love and deadens the nerves of sympathy. It blinds the vision from the most beautiful, paralyzes the tongue from uttering words of love and sympathy, and deafens the ear even to the music of the harps of angels.

One of the peculiarities of this disease is that the patient never knows when he is afflicted, and resents the suggestion that he is.

Who can measure the misery and cruelty that has been caused by prejudice? How many are the good and pure men and women who have suffered torture on rack and death in infamy because of the judgment of the court of the world's prejudice? It forecloses reason, bars judgment, and mocks pity. It creates its own law, establishes its own tribunal, renders its own judgment and executes its decrees with the vehemence of a monster.

It hurls its anathema maranatha at the innocent babe while at the mother's breast, and fouls the last tottering step of feeble age.

It is the apostle of hate, the high priest of war, the arch enemy of peace and good will.

Every nation has had its Torquamada, and every country its Calvary.

Many of the human family have been victims of the world's prejudice, but none have suffered as the Jew. This was natural. He was for centuries a stranger in all lands—a wanderer without a home. He wanted to live—the others condemned him to die. He struggled up the rugged road of persecution. Along this path he dragged the rust-crusted chains of intolerance. He lived on the dreams of the past. He feasted on the hope of the future.

He suffers today from the antagonism of the past. Antagonism produces prejudice.

Remove the infection from a wound and fever disappears. Remove antagonism and prejudice will vanish. Will the Jew of the world ever come into his own, will he ever stand equal with the fellowmen in the forum of public opinion, will he ever be judged, each individual, for his worth, and not pre-judged?

Just as sure as truth in the end will prevail.

There is but one cure and treatment—an abundance of the sunshine of truth—large portions of pure literary food—a complete rest from antagonism—with special directions to the nurses in the world's clinic to minister to the patients with plenty of love, consideration and sympathy.

GREATER ZIONIST PROSPECTS IN RUSSIA.

The new conditions in Russia are opening up enormous prospects for the Zion and Jewish causes. This view, which was held by the Provisional Zionist Committee immediately upon learning of the fortunate revolution in Russia, has been confirmed by cable dispatches from Moscow, Copenhagen and London. In each of these countries the leaders of the movement, in close touch with the actual incidents that are transpiring in Russia, are convinced that the Zionist cause will gain tremendously through the granting of freedom and the creation of equality in Russia.

The leaders of the Zionist movement throughout the world are united in a common policy to be pursued at the end of the war, and are in agreement that the revolution in Russia not only opens up a great opportunity for propaganda and the public avowal of Zionism by tens of thousands of Russian Jews who have heretofore been compelled to be silent, but that the creation of a representative government renders possible the formulation of a political program which, of necessity, it would not have been easy to put before an autocratic government. The Zionist Organization of America is pursuing the regular course of its work, finding in the revolution a gratifying spur for greater efforts in every direction.

CONFERENCE OF LODGES OF CENTRAL ILLINOIS.

At a conference of the lodges of Central Illinois, held in Peoria, on Wednesday afternoon, March 7, 1917, it was

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that all of the lodges in the State of Illinois, outside of Chicago, shall send, to the next convention of District Grand Lodge No. 6, to be held in July, 1917, the full quota of delegates so as to much more fully acquaint the members of the various lodges, through their delegates, with the actual work that is being done in this district and in the Order generally. It was

Further Resolved, That every member of each of said lodges be notified, by the secretary of each lodge, of the place of the holding of the various conventions of the District Grand Lodge and inform each member that such meetings are open to every member of the Order, and that, not only the representatives and past presidents, but every member of the Order, is welcome to attend any of its sessions and is invited and urged to do so. It was

Further Resolved, That for the purpose of bringing more activities into the lodge in the State of Illinois, outside of Chicago, that a committee of two be ap pointed for the purpose of conferring with the various lodges in the State of Illinois, outside of Chicago, for the purpose of organizing a Central Council of B’nai B’rith lodges throughout the state, outside of Chicago, with the view to create more activities among the various lodges and promote better and more serviceable activities in said lodges and to bring closer relationship, socially and intellectually, between the members thereof. It was Further Resolved, That said committee confer with each lodge and request the appointment of two delegates to a conference to be held with said committee in the near future for the purpose of carrying out the objects above set forth.

The committee appointed for this purpose was Seymour A. Woolner of Progress Lodge No. 113, Peoria, Ill., and Samuel Levin of Danville Lodge, Danville, Ill. Said committee has decided to hold a conference meeting at which two delegates from each lodge in Illinois, outside of Chicago, are requested to be present, at Springfield, Ill., on Sunday afternoon, April 1, at 2 o’clock in the Leland Hotel of that city, and each lodge is asked to select two delegates and see that the lodge is represented at such conference.

JEWS IN THE WAR ZONE AND ON THE BATTLEFIELD.

The disastrous effect of the catastroph on Jewish life may be gauged from the fact that out of twenty-five Provinces which constitute the Russian Pale of Settlement, fifteen Provinces were completely in the war zone, and three more Provinces partially so. Only seven Governments of the “Pale” are removed from the actual zone. To this must be added the whole of Galicia and now Rumania, the Jews of which are in the very heart of the firing line. As to the number of Jews fighting on the battlefield, Mr. Goldberg, despite exhaustive research was unable to give definite figures owing to the strict secrecy as to their forces maintained by all the belligerent governments. It was, however, definitely established that at the outbreak of hostilities there were 370,000 Jews in the Russian army and it could safely be stated that the number had increased since then up to 600,000. After a careful examination of the number of men fighting in proportion to the population in each country, Mr. Goldberg arrives at the conclusion that the Jewish people furnishes an army of 884,000 on the various battlefields—at all events, the number of Jews actually fighting cannot be less than 850,000.

NEXT ZIONIST CONGRESS IN RUSSIA.

Nahum Sokolow, a member of the Zionist Inner Actions Committee is fostering a movement which has already gained great headway in Europe to hold the next International Zionist Congress in Russia.

Under the old regime, Zionism occupied an anomolous position in that country Some departments of the government regarded the movement as legal, while others regarded it as illegal. Several attempts were made to hold a Zionist Congress in Russia, but it was impossible to obtain the permission of the Czar. Under the new regime, especially with men like Milukof and Kerensky at the head, Mr. Sokolow has reason to believe that a Zionist Congress would be welcomed in Russia, and he has already begun active work with that end in view.

ACTIVITY OF SOCIAL SERVICE COMMITTEE OF DISTRICT No. 2, I. O. B. B.

The Social Service Committee of District No. 2, B’nai B’rith, has this Passover done some very important things in Missouri, and particularly in St. Louis. In the absence of Mr. Billikopf, chairman of the committee, Mr. Oscar Leonard, superintendent Jewish Educational and Charitable Association of St. Louis, who is vice-chairman of the committee, has been appointed acting chairman. In this capacity and in his own official capacity as superintendent of the J. E. & C. A., he visited Jefferson City and obtained permission from the warden of Missouri penitentiary to have a Seder service for the twenty-four Jewish prisoners. He arranged with Mr. Taub of Jefferson City to conduct the Seder. Mr. Leonard also requested the Young Men and Ladies’ Hebrew Charity Society of St. Louis to furnish matzos, kosher sausage and fruit to the prisoners. The organization gladly acceded to this request. The organization also furnishes these articles to the Jews in all city institutions in St. Louis, in addition to furnishing all necessities for Passover to the needy Jews.

This Seder service at the penitentiary will be the first in the history of the state. Mr. Leonard is also responsible for the services held there on Rosh Hashonah and Yom Kippur.

Mr. Leonard visited Jefferson Barracks also and asked the adjutant in command to permit the Jewish soldiers stationed there to attend Seder at the various temples in St. Louis. This request was readily granted and all Jewish soldier desiring to attend Seder service and par take of the Passover meal were given opportunity to do so as guests of temples

The officer at the head of the National Guards in St. Louis was also asked by Mr. Leonard to permit the Jewish guards to go to their homes in the city for the first two days of Passover, and particularly to attend Seder.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE.

A few weeks ago Mr. Walter L. Joyner proprietor of the second largest store in Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Canada, inserted an advertisement in the “Evening Times” of that city, which contained the following words: “ARSON:—Derived from the Hebrew (See Cook & Henderson)”.

A number of our co-religionists, under the leadership of Brother D. Beckman, a member of the order, started a libel suit against Mr. Joyner, but at the request of some of the leading Christian people of the community, the matter was settled out of court, Mr. Joyner paying all expenses and costs incurred by the plaintiffs and agreed to publish an apology in the local press. We herewith reprint the letter of Mr. Joyner as it appeared in the “Evening Times”, of March 12, 1917.

PUBLIC APOLOGY

Moose Jaw, Sask., March 10, 1917.

The Editor The Evening Times,
Moose Jaw, Sask.:

Dear Sir—In your issue of the 15th, November last, my advertisement contained the following words:

“ARSON—Derived from the Hebrew (See Cook & Henderson).”

Objection was taken that this reflected on our fellow citizens of the Jewish faith, and legal proceedings were instituted against me for libel. I now wish to state publicily and frankly that I regret having used these words, and I apologize to all the Jewish puplic of Moose Jaw.

I recognize that many of our most highly respected citizens are of the Jewish race, and I have no justification to offer for in any way reflecting upon them.

I desire to give this apology as great publicity as was given to the libelous words above mentioned.

Yours truly,
WALTER L. JOYNER

AN AMERICAN PROTECTORATE FOR PALESTINE.

There is a growing sentiment in Europe to place Palestine under American control after the war. A movement in that direction is indicated by Mr. Norman Hapgood, the well-known American publicist, who is now the London correspondent of the New York Evening Post.

In an article, over his signature, discussing the territorial settlement after the war, which was published in the Evening Post on February 17th, Mr. Hapgood writes:

“One especially interesting aspect of the future settlement involves Palestine. The whole Jewish question will come to the front soon. When Parliament met on February 7th, one member raised the question of the Jews in Russia. There have been recent anti-Semitic developments in Germany. France has made claims in Syria and Russian statesmen have backed these claims. But the movement grows to put Palestine under American control”.

BIBLES IN SCHOOL BILL DEFEATED IN ARIZONA.

Early in February a bill was introduced in the Arizona State Legislature bearing upon the reading of the Bible in public schools.

The bill was particularly obnoxious because it sought to nullify a very good law on the statute books of Arizona, and because it endeavored to accomplish this under the guise of a very innocent amendment.

The statute formerly read as follows: “Any teacher who shall use any sectarian or denominational books, or teach any sectarian doctrine, or conduct any sectarian religious exercises in his school, or who shall fail to comply with any of the provisions mentioned in this chapter, shall be deemed guilty of unprofessional conduct, and it shall be the duty of the proper authority to revoke his certificate or diploma”.

The amendment to this statute consisted of the following phrase to be added at the end of the statute: “Provided that nothing in the Act shall be construed to prohibit reading from any standard version of the Bible without comment or the repetition of the portions thereof without comment”. The passage of this amendment would have frustrated the purpose of the original statute.

Rabbi Martin Zielonka of El Paso, Texas, prominent B’nai B’rith worker of District No. 7, took active interest in the campaign to prevent the passage of this bill. Literature dealing with the Bible in the public schools was freely distributed among the voters in Arizona. As a result of his efforts, in which he was aided by Bros. B. E. Marks of Phoenix, C. F. Solomon and H. B. Goldman of Tuscon, Ariz., active workers of the B’nai B’rith lodges in their respective communities, the bill was defeated.

At the recent convention of District Grand Lodge No. 4, held in San Francisco in the month of February, that portion of the message of the president of the District Grand Lodge dealing with the Jewish Congress was referred to a special committee, which submitted the following report, and it was unanimously adopted by the convention:

Report of Special Committee.

San Francisco, Feb. 18, 1917.

Sirs and Brothers:

Your committee to whom was referred that portion of the Grand President’s report under the heading, “The Jewish Congress”, respectfully submits the following report:

We favor and approve the comments of the Grand President and urge the members of our Order to take active interest in the work of the Congress

We note with much satisfaction and pride the important part in the preliminary proceedings of the Jewish Congress taken by the president of our Order, Bro. Adolf Kraus.

We unqualifiedly approve and indorse the Jewish Congress and pledge to it our enthusiastic support. We favor a democratic method of selection of representatives and we invoke for the Congress about to be convened the hearty and loyal support of all Jews in America and pledge to it our support.

Fraternally submitted,
Martin A. Meyer, Chairman,
Otto Irving Wise,
Abraham Jonas,
Hugo K. Asher,

CONDITION OF JEWS IN BULGARIA.

The condition of the Jews at the present time in Bulgaria is deplorable, according to official reports. There are 90,000 Jews in Bulgaria now, inclusive of the conquered territories. Among these there are about 2,500 families of Jewish soldiers that are destitute and need support. There are, in addition, 2,200 Roumanian prisoners of the Jewish faith who urgently require help. These prisoners arrived in Bulgaria without sufficient clothing and in a starving condition. They do not receive enough to eat from the authorities, and in order to survive must be aided by the Jewish community. In addition to this there are 1,000 orphans who are entirely dependent upon Jewish charity.

Friendship is for the aid and comfort through all the relations and passages of life and death. It is fit for serene days and graceful gifts, and country rambles, but also for rough roads and hard fare, shipwreck, poverty and persecution.—Emerson.

TESTIMONIAL DINNER TO MAURICE P. DAVIDSON.

Flatbush Lodge No. 753 tendered a dinner to Bro. Maurice P. Davidson, its founder, and first vice-president of the district. Among the invited guests were Bros. Charles Hartman, Herman Asher and Dr. Alexander Lyons. The dinner was tendered to Bro. Davidson “in appreciation of his unremitting efforts in behalf of the lodge and the encouragement and inspiration that he has given to its activities”, also as an expression of the personal esteem and affection in which he is held by the brothers of the lodge.

The gathering was most cordial and enthusiastic. President Clarence Bachrach, who acted as toastmaster, spoke of Bro. Davidson as “a leader in B’nai B’rith work and a prince of good fellows”. Bros. Hartman and Asher indorsed the oastmaster’s encomium of Bro. Davidson, reciting their knowledge to him as a man, a Ben B’rith and as a gentleman.

Bro. Davidson, who is known all through the district as the silver-tongued orator, responded in his usual happy manner, and aroused great enthusiasm by declaring that the goal of Flatbush Lodge was to be an organization for the good and benefit not only of the district, but for the entire borough of Brooklyn.

After the dinner an open meeting of Flatbush Lodge was held in the lodge room, which was addressed by Bro. Dr. Alexander Lyons, who delivered an interesting and stirring address on “The Jew in America”.

Before the meeting adjourned, President Bachrach announced that the Hon. E. Lewis, District Attorney of Kings County, was an applicant for admission to the lodge.

The program closed with the singing of “America”.

The sum of $30,000 has already been raised by Hadassah, the Women’s Zionist organization, for the Medical Unit, consisting of ten physicians, ten nurses and an adequate supply of medicines, which it proposes to dispatch to Palestine, at the earliest possible moment, to combat typhus and other plagues which are ravaging that country.

ISRAEL'S LOVE SONG

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

During the week of Passover it is the wont of the Synagogue to read the Song of Songs, that poem of love which is ascribed to Solomon. Passover is in the first place the festival of the spring. Its keynote is the re-birth of nature aroused from the wintry sleep. "For, lo, the Winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of singing is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land." These words from the song itself describe poetically the change that comes with spring's arrival. Much has been written and said about this little book in our Scriptures. At all times a misguided notion failed to perceive what it had to do in the collection, beside the Law and the Prophets and the Psalms. Cynics have remarked that you might just as well look for the erotic poetry of Anacreon or Sappho among the folio volumes of a theological library as for this book in the Bible. On the surface indeed we have before us love songs, such as today are still sung by the peasants in Palestine on the occasion of nuptials. It is customary for the bridegroom to be impersonated as a royal personage. It has also been remarked that poets are not given to sing of the love for their spouses. Marital love is taken to be of the homely kind which does not inspire sonnets. It would nevertheless be false to say that in the idyllic creations of folk song free love is the theme. The shepherd and the shepherdess may not be conventional, but it is a far cry from the licentious passion that changes its object and fleets from mistress to mistress. Idyllic conditions of by-gone days cannot be measured by standards of conventionalized society. But if it were permitted to employ standards, the shepherdess who yields to her shepherd lover's caresses becomes his for better for worse. The charms of loved and lover may be drawn a bit too realistically in the song. We haye before us an Oriental product. But even judged as a mere love song, ideal heights are scaled. "For love is strong as death, jealousy (or passion), is cruel as the grave; the flashes thereof are flashes of fire, a very flame of the Lord. Many waters cannot quench love. neither can the floods drown it; if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, he would utterly be contemned". A superfine scholar who is loath to credit the Jew with this lofty sentiment has turned the last clause into its very opposite. "If a man would give all the substance of his house for love, would he utterly be contemned"? This is plain malice. We may abide by the ordinary interpretation and thus find the high conception that love cannot be bought; it is too holy for that, a very flame of the Lord.

Lofty as this thought is, the song owes its presence in the sacred collection most probably to the interpretation which the Synagogue has chosen to place upon it. And no matter what we may think of the cause of its incorporation into the Bible, the Synagogue in making it a part of the liturgy of the Passover festival has endowed it with a meaning suitable to its own needs. Passover is the festival of the spring, it is also the festival of the nation's spring-day. On Passover we celebrate the birth of our people. We narrate the story of the exodus, the deliverance from Pharaonic bondage. The Synagogue lives not merely upon the past. It has its eye fixed upon the future deliverance, the final redemption, the Passover which is to come. And so though it sits in the darkness amidst persecution, it knows how to steel itself and to keep its energies instinct with vitality against which all the powers of evil battle in vain by dwelling on the eternal bond of love which links it to God and God to Israel. The Song of Songs is Israel's love song. Our enemies know full well the strength that resides in the conviction which the song expresses in the avowal, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine." And so they seek to portray God's relation to Israel as conditional and dissoluble. They would persuade us that our prophets looked upon the union as capable of severance. The prophets, they say, preach an ideal of righteousness of which the people naturally fall short. And so these preachers reiterate to the people their hopeless doom. The righteous God must divorce the unrighteous nation. An Amos is turned into a religious nihilist whose message is that if Israel cannot be righteous, it is far better that he perish. If the world cannot be just, it must likewise perish. Now there are all sorts of thoughts in the religion of the Bible about a world judgment. But I make bold to maintain that no prophet rested his case in the utter annihilation of Israel or of the world. The exigencies of moral preaching might lead to the use of hyperbolic language. But these religious minds, we may take it, would have recoiled from the thought of a self-sufficient Deity content to dwell in loneliness with a world reduced to ashes. No, the highest thought of Scriptures is that the world was created by God, and therefore is the best of the worlds, and therefore again is a world that will abide. The stern judge is also the loving father. It may be a human trait to forgive the unworthy, but it is also divine. Israel is the elect of God. This faith underlies the Law and the Prophets. The prophets might chide, but they also know how to comfort. Do not listen to them who excise the comforting passages and claim that they were added by posterity. You may just as well cut the peroration out of a noble discourse. No, the prophets are often enough out of sorts with the sordid co-religionist. But they never forget the ideal Israel, the Jew that will be in the future, in whom all the potencies implanted by God will be realized. And it is against that day that they would prepare the people.

And in line with the prophet-preachers in the Scriptures the masters of the haggadic sermon developed the thought that Israel is linked to God in an indissoluble union. God loved Israel in the desert. Israel followed the Lord with enthusiasm and faith. The Jew might be swayed from the course of fealty. He might be lured by the siren voice of ease and comfort. He might sacrifice his future to the good things of the present. But when brought back to himself, Israel was sound at the core. Israel's emotions are torn between two extremes. On the one hand, love must not be awakened nor stirred up, until it please. The end must not be hastened. It must come of itself, spontaneously, miraculously. Salvation comes when you least expect it. It cannot be taken by storm. A sane check indeed on revolutionary proceedings. On the other hand, the Synagogue fervently prays, "Make haste, my beloved". It is the Synagogue's heart-rending cry out of the depths of misery and persecution. The rabbis say that if Israel approves himself worthy, God will speed the end; otherwise, the end will come in its due season. The end will come. That is Israel's abiding faith. That is the keynote of its love song. "Love is strong as death". Moral regeneration is accomplished not by chiding, by the rod of chastisement, but by love. Both are needed, and both must be resorted to. Naturally the love itself must be the purified, chastened one, into which no selfish thought is suffered to glide. Love covereth up all offense, because love conquers sin. The stony heart melts before the ray of love. It becomes responsive to the best promptings. If the Lord loves Israel, it is because Israel proves himself worthy of the divine affection. We may stray from the path of rectitude. We may forget our marked course. We may have our reprobates. But the core of Israel is healthy. "I sleep, but my heart waketh". The least touch of the divine afflatus rouses us from our moral torpor. We bethink ourselves of our worthier nature, of our nobler self. God's love for Israel abides because Israel must sooner or later recover his true character and consecrate himself to the service of the ideal. Israel was not made to rejoice like the nations. Israel chose to be linked to the ideal of absolute holiness. And the Absolue became, as it were, indwelling in him. God and the Torah and Israel are one. So teach the mystics. And the Song of Songs is in the interpretation which the Synagogue has placed upon it, the mystic poem of the union of God and Israel which abides forever.

FRENCH SOCIALISTS FOR JEWISH NATIONAL RIGHTS.

The French Socialist party has put itself on record in favor of the complete emancipation of the Jewish people, and as recognizing its right to national existence. A resolution has been adopted at the convention of the Socialist party of France demanding that the Peace Conference, when held, shall grant equal rights to the Jews in every country, and national rights where recognition is accorded to national groups. The latter resolution relates to the movement that is afoot throughout Europe and America to obtain national rights for the Jews in Palestine and Austro-Hungary.

in the preceding year he had no visitor, had never received a letter nor word of encouragement. A Big Brother was at once appointed, but the Superintendent was so prejudiced that it was felt best to have Abraham removed. A friend legally adopted the lad and then gave his consent for Abraham to enlist as a sailor in the navy. Last month he was sailing West to the Philippines on an American warship and will no doubt become an upright man through the careful discipline there enforced. In that reformatory there was slight chance for his development along proper lines. Now we believe he will be a valuable Jew and American.

More important than looking after lads who have come before the Juvenile Court, is preventive work. I mean that we should provide Big Brothers for boys who lack parental guidance at home, and are in danger of going wrong. Then we shall get hold of the boys before they fall from grace. In many Northern cities, the newsboy problem, with its menacing temptations, is a Jewish problem. Often 75 per cent of the newsboys are Jewish. Many of them need guidance. Philip is a good illustration of this point. He was a newsboy, with two older brothers, one of whom is in prison and the other in the Home for Defectives. Before this child, for he is merely 13 years old, might commit some trespass, we gave him a Big Brother. After school hours Philip goes to the tin factory owned by his Big Brother. He thinks he is at work, but he is merely kept off the street. This shop has emphasized his need of school education, and Philip no longer plays truant. He keeps out of evil ways and has a good report card each month. Another boy has a tubercular mother, and his father is a Schlemihl. Thanks to the Big Brother, this boy is regular in his school attendance and earnest in his work.

Another very interesting case of co-operation is Leonard, 20 years of age. Five months ago a Social worker phoned Mr. Lashman, in charge of our Chicago Big Brother work, that a Jewish young man was a general nuisance in the neighborhood and in need of medical attention. Mr. Lashman no sooner saw the deformed and sickly person than he interested a medical member of our Order as Big Brother. Leonard was taken to the hospital and his case was diagnosed, after which an operation was perfomed, successfully. Then an expensive brace was purchased through private subscription, and after three months' treatment, Leonard left the hospital a well man. A position was secured and then we heard from a sister in Columbus, Ohio. Since he was no longer a hoodlum and invalid, but now earning a good wage, she was perfectly satisfied to have him in Columbus, and work for her husband. We communicated with the Columbus committee, and a Big Brother will keep in friendly touch with Leonard. The doctor says that had this deformity been neglected much longer, there would have been no recovery. Had it been treated three years sooner, no operation would have been necessary.

In short, for I must hasten on, there are now fifty-two boys under the care of Chicago Big Brothers. Many of them might otherwise have gone to Reform Schools. Others are being saved from evil ways, to lives of future usefulness. On this Big Brother Movement, we are placing the greatest stress. It has already proved its worth and usefulness.

Released Prisoners.

We next come to the problem of the man who has already committed some trespass and served his jail sentence. On his release we should extend the hand of friendship, lest he fall again. For our future protection in America, as well as for the welfare of the man, we should provide a Big Brother for the released convict. We no longer look upon prisoners as necessarily evil minded men. Too many are victims of circumstance. At least 25 per cent would never have entered prison if defended by competent lawyers. Economic stress drives many unfortunate Jews to deeds of misconduct. Few Jews are so set in evil ways that they will refuse earnest efforts to redeem them. We should give every released prisoner the benefit of the doubt, and so the B'nai B'rith lodges are encouraged to provide work and fellowship for men on their release from prison. As never before, under the inspiration of Thomas Mott Osborne, prison reform is sweeping the country. We Jews must not be backward, but should welcome every Jew who, on his release from jail, desires to lead an upright life. I should like to tell you what Mr. Osborne said of the Jewish boys in New York. Without their loyal backing, the Mutual Welfare League could never have achieved its present success. A co-religionist endangered his life recently to prevent the possibility of Mr. Osborne being killed, and Jewish citizens are foremost in aiding this wonderful reform in prison methods. Some Jewish boys are soon to be released from Sing Sing. One, a fine mechanic, will be free on March 1. He never before was in trouble, and has a most exemplary prison record. Who will give him a new start in life? Shall he go back to his gang in New York, or start life anew amid more encouraging surroundings? Nothing is more gratifying, in the midst of my travels, than to find Jews willing to accept a boy who wishes to commence life once more as an upright man. Here is a chance for genuine service. I call upon you men, to assist our Order in this great undertaking, and render such aid as you can to the released prisoner. Thursday night, as I left the office in Chicago, two friends accompanied me to the station. The one has spent the larger part of the last ten years in state prison, a well known burglar. The second has a long prison record at Sing Sing. Both have mended their ways and are living clean, upright and worthy lives. Each man has a Big Brother, who helped him find a steady position and constantly offers him fellowship.

Americanize the Immigrant.

But I must hasten on to other plans of our Department. This terrible war has emphasized the need for Americanizing our immigrants. The B'nai B'rith is co-operating with the Bureau of Education at Washington and urges its lodges to make a survey of the Jewish residents of the community. This is especially true in the smaller towns, where night schools are not always included as part of the school curriculum. Where no night school exists, we encourage the starting of one, so that our Jewish immigrànts may, as quickly as possible, learn the customs and language of America. Both men and women should be urged to acquire the English language, for women will soon vote in most states, and inquiry shows that invariably the mother speaks only Yiddish when a Jewess is broght before the Juvenile Court. We should awaken public opinion to the need for properly equipped night schools, as well as classes for adults in the day time.

In other words, just as the Big Brother is a blessing to the younger lad, so we would extend the scope of this principle and urge the B'nai B'rith to be Big Brothers to Jews in America. We should look after our own, and place them on their feet so as to be independent and self supporting. In a larger sense, we believe that the Jews of America, united, should act as Big Brother to all citizens in this land, and thus become a real blessing to America. Let our very actions show that just as we Jews are helping our co-religionists to overcome poverty, so all the citizens of this land can abolish and prevent poverty. This is the greatest shame of the century. In the classic words of Henry George, "poverty is a crime". Before happiness will rule the hearts of all people, poverty must be vanquished, disease must be starved to death, and ignorance of God's laws must give way before the knowledge of divine precepts. Let us Jews blaze the trail in this glorious warfare.

Setting such an example, we shall repay in part the great debt we owe our beloved country. As it shelters us, let us enrich America by the example of our own lives. God speed the B'nai B'rith on this holy mission, that both the Order and the individual members may fulfill the divine injunction, "Be Thou a Blessing".

DUTCH JEWS PLAN RELIEF ACTION FOR JEWISH WAR ORPHANS.

A peculiar relief action is being planned among the Dutch Jews for Jewish war victims, viz.: an action on behalf of the needy Jewish children from the various belligerent countries. It is intended, according to the amount of money the Dutch-Jewish public will subscribe, to educate unprotected Jewish children, but especially war orphans in Holland. A beginning was made a considerable time ago with Jewish child-refugees from Belgium. The intention now exists to extend this relief work in the above mentioned manner. For the promotion of this object a conference was held at the rabbi's office in Amsterdam a short time ago, a number of influential Dutch Jews from various parts of the land being present. It was resolved to begin the action under the management of a central committee. The composition of the committee has not yet been fixed, but it will probably be done very shortly.

THE KEHILLAH, XXXI

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

The year of the great Revolution was the second of the incumbency of Samson Raphael Hirsch as Landrabbiner of Moravia. The great enthusiasm with which this remarkable man was greeted when he entered upon the duties of his office was due to the naive hope that the Jews placed in the improvement of the external forms of Jewish life and in the progress of education. In all probability well-meaning Christians cherished the same ideal. They felt that the condition in which the Jews were placed, with the mediaeval restriction on the right of residence, on occupation, and above all, the shameful restriction of the number of marriages, was untenable. They consoled themselves with the illusion that all these acts of injustice were necessary in order to protect the country against the bad habits of the Jews. Let the Jews begin first to reform their habits and then we shall consider the improvement of their status. Such was the leading idea of enlightened statesmen. With one sudden gush of wind the events of March 13, 1848, had swept away the dust of the middle ages. For the Christian statesmen there was nothing to consider any more, and for the Jews one of the leading factors in their desire for progress was gone. Not that they expected conditions to remain stationary, but the reform was not so urgently needed any more.

Hirsch felt uncomfortable. His conception of religion and of Judaism's future was heretical to the orthodox of Nikolsburg and not progressive enough for the progressive element. He certainly, as his later career showed, made a wise move when he accepted the call to Frankfort am Main, to become the spiritual head of a small fraction of this historic congregation, for there he could fight for orthodoxy, while in Nikolsburg, if he did fight, he had to fight orthodoxy. The position of the Landrabbiner became vacant in 1851. If the place was to be filled there were two alternatives, either to proceed with the election according to the former legal mode or to devise a new legislation. The old method of election was that each of the six districts (Kreis) should elect a delegate. These delegates again should propose to the government three names, of which the governor should select one as Landrabbiner. This procedure was impracticable, because the new constitution had abolished the division of the province into Kreis-districts, substituting for it smaller administrative units called "Bezirkshauptmannschaft". Furthermore, the freedom of residence created Jewish settlements outside of the fifty-four towns where Jews had been domiciled before. These settlements formed as yet no legal congregation, and consequently their members would be excluded from the franchise, although they were amongst the wealthiest and most prominent Jews of the province. No small difficulty was created by the definition of the task of a Landrabbiner. Formerly he was the agent of the government in distributing the special Jewish taxes. These had ceased to exist. He was directed to use his spiritual influence by warning his parishioners against buying stolen goods, or against assisting the government's enemies. Such a task was now obsolete. He further had to prescribe the tractate of the Talmud which was to be studied in the various Yeshibahs. These Yeshibahs had almost entirely gone out of existence. The government recognized that a complete reorganization was necessary, but there were so many pressing duties in remodeling the old-fashioned structure of the Hapsburg realm that such a small affair could not be taken up at once. In addition, it was the guiding feature of Austria's statesmanship to take its time in every move. Even in my own personal experience, I remember that officials who had to make a report considered it beneath their dignity to act at once. Such haste would be considered either a yielding to the subjects of the empire or might be proof that the honorable gentlemen did not have much work on hand. So the election of a new Landrabbiner was indefinitely postponed. Meantime the government appointed upon Hirsch's suggestion the Rabbi of Boskowitz, Abraham Placzek as temporary "Stellvertreter" Landrabbiner. Rabbi Abraham was one of the mildest representatives of old orthodoxy. A learned Talmudist and strictly observant, he was tolerant of others and acknowledged that modern times required new methods. His son Baruch, probably still living, is the Rabbi of the newly formed congregation of Bruenn since 1861, was sent to Frankfort to study under Hirsch. The old Rabbi's official activity was of a merely formal nature. Occasionally the government would submit to him some question for an opinion, as the condemnation of a cemetery, or a new plan for religious instruction in public schools. Otherwise he did not seem to exercise the regular prerogatives of a Landrabbiner. Local Rabbis were elected without his previous consent, or if his consent was demanded he never seems to have refused it.

Two instances of this kind I may save from oblivion, as a piece of old Kulturgeschichte. In both instances I shall not give any names, though the parties concerned have died long ago. One case was that of a graduate of the orthodox Berlin seminary, and the facts were given to me by the old Rabbi personally. The young man came to the Rabbi to be examined for his rabbinical license. As a typical representative of the Hildesheimer school, he complained of the difficulty to obtain kosher milk in his town, and added that he was compelled to use goat milk, keeping for this purpose a goat in his house. Rabbi Placzek, telling me the story afterwards, said with a smile: "I would have allowed him to use the milk which other people in his town used if he had known a little more of rabbinical law".

The story shows the type of that vague emotional attitude of good old orthodoxy. In theory the old Rabbi would surely not have abrogated any section of the Shulhan Aruk. In practice he was more indulgent. The Hildesheimer type of orthodox mannerisms was unsympathetic to him, as was the attitude of Hirsch to the majority of his rabbinical contemporaries in Moravia. The second case was more serious. A progressive congregation had elected a young man from Hesse as Rabbi, who showed a most surprising ignorance of rabbinical literature and of traditional Jewish practices. He possessed the confidence of the majority of the congregation who were advanced liberals, for the city, a prominent railroad center, was perhaps the most advanced congregation in that section of the country, but there were a few old-fashioned people left, who declared that the Rabbi was not properly qualified for his office. Not because they considered this a serious objection, but for the sake of maintaining peace in the congregation, the trustees requested their Rabbi to go to the Landrabbiner to obtain from him a license. The young man seems to have expected that the whole transaction would be a mere formality, but when he came Rabbi Placzek set aside the fore noon the next day for an examination. The candidate was not prepared for such a task, left town the same evening, sending to the Landrabbiner a note of regret, in which he declared that he was called home by telegraph, and hoped the Landrabbiner would be convinced from the short conversation which they had that he was properly qualified for this office, and in order to compensate him for the trouble he begged to enclose a bill of fifty florins. Rabbi Placzek indignantly sent the letter and enclosure to the congregation, but the matter was hushed up and the man remained in office to the day of his death.

These two incidents prove that hierarchical institutions are not very efficient in Jewish life. The congregation of Nikolsburg would hardly ever have appealed to the temporary Landrabbiner for an opinion on the candidate which they selected for office. For the present this congregation was in a quandary. It therefore did what the government did in larger questions and postponed the solution. It is reported to the government that temporarily Rabbi Hirsch Teltscher, the oldest Dayan, was to be placed in charge of the rabbinical duties. This Rabbi was dead before I came to Nikolsburg, but I knew his family well because his step-son was married to a cousin of my father's. He inherited from his step-father a kosher wine business. There was nothing undignified in such an occupation, for drunkenness was very rare among Jews, and I do not even know whether Rabbi Hirsch served people in his own home or whether he merely sold wine in bottles, as was the case in the business of his step-son. This incident has its value as a picture of conditions, because it would easily make us understand that in mediaevl times the Rabbis of Germany were not salaried officials of the congregation, but like trustees of modern congregational institutions could spare enough of their time to attend to the spiritual needs of their coreligionists.

In 1855 a new Rabbi was finally elected. He was Solomon Quetsch, a native of Nikolsburg, born in 1798, and for a number of years Rabbi of Leipnik, one of the larger congregations of Moravia. A disciple of Rabbi Mordecai Benet, he conducted his office in the spirit of his master, regardless of the change of times. He held his office, however, only a few months, for he died Jan. 30, 1856. Although I have previously referred to some facts of his life, I shall give a connected presentation of his personality as far as it has been reported to me". The peculiar name Quetsch ("squeeze") may have been originally a nick-name. He was a man of very small stature, as was his brother Abraham, an insignificant village Jew, whom I knew personally. The name has a little story which, though it is difficult to translate it into English, I shall try to make intelligible. Rabbi Quetsch was an opponent of the new school, and pointing once to the peculiar fact that so many advocates of liberalism had names connected with "son", as Jacobson, Philipson, Bensew, etc., he said: "Looking upon the activity of these men, I can understand why our Pesach Hagadah says, 'Our troubles, these are the sons'", to which one sympathizer with liberalism replied, "The Hagadah continues: 'Our anguish, this is the Quetsch' (oppression)".

Clearer is the expression of the feeling presented in a story that was told me by a man who was present at the funeral of the Rabbi when the old Dayan Reb Itzig Weinberger, the last relic of the era of Mordecai Benet, delivered the funeral address. He began with a verse from Lamentations: "The Mount of Zion that has been laid waste, foxes walk on it; Fuchsen, Lumpen, Teitsche Rabbonim". Reb Itzig, who died in 1868 at the age of 76, lived long enough to see another German Rabbi in the historic old Kehillah.

When I came to Nikolsburg, the widow of Rabbi Solomon Quetsch was still living in my immediate neighborhood, and Maier Froeschels, a teacher of the Jewish school, with whom I boarded, used to attend to her correspondence, so that I had often the opportunity of seeing her. She was an unusually homely woman, which, as I said once before, was considered the proper kind of wife for a Rabbi. She was called the Rebbezin Rochel and lived with her sister, also the widow of a Rabbi, whose name I believe was Langfelder. She was known as Rebezin Pessel. Her husband had been Rabbi in Nagy-Tapolcsany, Hungary, and was referred to as Reb Wolf Topplechoyn. Family names, while nearly a hundred years old, were still in many instances existing merely in the official records. The name of the widow of Rabbi Quetsch furnished the clue to a clever story told of Shemaiah Hazan, who officiated at Liepsic, when Quetsch was Rabbi there. The Rabbi, who was of delicate health, was often confined to his house, and the Hazan, calling on him, said with an allusion to the Rabbi's wife: "The Rabbi will never get well unless he shall make a pilgrimage to Rachel's grave". It was also said that when he was quite ill in Nikolsburg his wife lamented, saying: "My crown is being taken from me", and the Rabbi, in spite of his severe illness, said: "If I am your crown, you are my 'Kren'" (horseradish, the symbol of the bitterness of life). Shemaiah was a regular type of the Hazan who had the blood of an artist, taking life easy. This seems to have been quite common, for Moses Sofer, when asked by a Rabbi whether a Hazan who lived an immoral life may be retained in office, replied: "The question is clearly decided in our codes. A man who lives an immoral life cannot be the messenger of the congregation, but privately I would advise you not to go too far in your protest, for if this man will be discharged you are not likely to get another one who is better, for as long as he charms the people with his voice they will not care for anything else". One time an unmarried woman in the congregation gave birth to a son, and a wit of the congregation said he knew a very appropriate name for the baby. He should be called "Yekum Purkan", because he was "Min Shemaiah." Unfortunately the joke cannot be explained, for if the pun is not understood it would lose the point.

Another story which occurred while I was in Nikolsburg is highly characteristic. Rebbezin Pessel was sick and the doctor ordered an enema. The midwife who acted as nurse in such a case was called, and finding both women in bed, asked to whom she should render the service. Pessel, who was very ill, could not reply, and Rochel said: "I need it, she is asleep, do not wake her up". She begrudged her sister even this questionable pleasure.

The Yeshibah in Nikolsburg under Rabbi Quetsch was a poor attempt to revive the agonizing old-fashioned mode of education. The long intervals that followed the death of the last two Rabbis and the progress of secularism had almost completely ruined it. In addition, the time of Rabbi Solomon's incumbency was too short to revive it, even if there should have been such a chance. Again, five years elapsed before another Rabbi was chosen. The congregation was now determined to elect a man with modern education and chose Dr. Maier Feuchtwang of Neutra, Hungary. Feuchtvang, whom I knew personally quite well, and whose instruction I received for several years, was born in Pappenheim, Bavaria, in 1814. After having served as Rabbi in Oettingen, he was called to Neutra, where he succeeded an old-fashioned Rabbi, Ezekiel Baneth, a distant relative of Rabbi Mordecai Benet, and therefore he had to suffer all the inconveniences of a pioneer of modernism, although he was a strictly observant Jew of the type represented in his native country by Rabbi Seligman Baer Bamberger of Wuertzburg. The large majority of the congregation, however, could not think of a man who spoke a correct German and had the manners of modern society as a religious Jew. Feuchtwang felt very uncomfortable, and was undoubtedly glad to go to the more cultured environment of Nikolsburg, although even there his religious life presented a conception quite different from that of his environment. When he came to Nikolsburg the congregation still had ten synagogues, of which only three were real synagogue buildings, while the others were merely rooms or an annex built into a narrow courtyard. A few years later five of the synagogues were closed. Those remaining were the beautiful Altschul, as the name indicates, the oldest of the synagogues, still furnished in the old style, having no pews, but seats arranged alongside the walls, east and west, or north and south, with a beautiful pulpit (Bimah) supported by four marble pillars in the center, the woman's synagogue being an annex, partitioned off from the main synagogue by a glass wall, although it had at the same time on the west and on the south sides a gallery, probably representing a later annex. The entrance to the two "Weiberschuls" was different from that leading to the man's synagogue. According to tradition, the floor of the synagogue was below the street level, a few steps leading from the vestibule to the synagogue proper. The next largest synagogue was the Neuschul, a fairly handsome plain building, already somewhat modern, for it had regular pews. The room for the women was in the gallery, though the entrance was different from that leading to the room of the men, and alongside the east wall there were seats, just as in the Altschul, with moveable desks, "Staender", looking somewhat like one of our music stands. Another synagogue was the Beth Hamidrash, called so because it originally may have served as such, but in my time the real Beth Hamidrash, with its library and three study rooms, was in an adjoining building, while the synagogue proper was only used as such. Besides these three synagogues, that were regular buildings, there was one consisting of a large room, frequented by men only. It was called the Hasidim Schul, and had been established by Rabbi Shmelke Horowitz, who, coming from Poland to Nikolsburg in 1773, as already once reported, introduced the Hasidic ritual, otherwise unknown in our country. The origin of the name has been completely forgotten at my time, and perhaps the only trace of the mysticism that inspired its founder was beginning the services every day with the confession of sins (Vidduy). Then for the sake of convenience the lower "Gass" had a synagogue, located in the rear of house, called Reb Nochem Gloser Schul, evidently named for its founder. A family by the name of Glaser still occupied the front part of the building.

The main service on Sabbath was held at ten o'clock. It began with the reading of the Torah, followed by the Musaf rayer, while the morning paper, Shaharit, was recited at daybreak in winter and at 6:30 in summer. This is a practice, which is never found anywhere else except in Moravia, corresponding to, if not influenced by, the Catholic high mass. The sermon, which was not a regular feature of the services, but delivered on holidays, and about once a month on Sabbath, began in the Altschul at 9:30, in order to give the attendants at other synagogues an opportunity to hear it. We boys, attending the "gymnasium" were not excused until ten o'clock, so that we arrived too late for the sermon. Arriving at the late for the sermon. Arriving at the synagogue, I remember having overheard a conversation in a group of people stand-

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent, Dr. M. Epstein

London, March 21, 1917.

Jews all over the world cannot but take a deep interest in the events passing before our eyes in Russia. Theirs is a double joy in free Russia. They welcome the new state of affairs in the same spirit and to the same extent as all those who love liberty and democratic institutions; but they welcome it also because it spells freedom to millions of Jews who have been unjustly treated. Jews in Russia, it is to be hoped, will now enjoy liberty of movement, liberty of economic action and the education of which hitherto they have been deprived. Just as Russia will progress in the main by the adoption of democratic institutions, so, too, she will profit by Jewish emancipation. Jewish energy and Jewish ability will work in the interests of their country, and the economic development of Russia cannot but be richer in consequence. Few Russian Jews have nothing but a feeling of love for the land of their birth. The country side, the stream besides whose banks they walked on the long Sabbath afternoons, the neighboring wood, the smell of the earth—how often have the praises of these been sung by the Jew who, born in Russia, had to flee from persecution there. It requires the pen of a Burke to do justice to the meaning of the revolution. One of the last bulwarks of feudalism and tyranny has fallen. Only two more remain in Europe. There are people who say that if the war has done nothing else, it has at any rate left a landmark in history comparable to that left by the French Revolution.

Hitherto the Jew hoped two things from the war. One was the establishment of a Jewish settlement in Palestine under proper safeguards. The other was the granting of civil and religious liberty to Jews where they were oppressed. In effect this meant that the Jews of Russia and Roumania, and to a less extent also, of Prussia, should be accorded the same rights as other citizens. But Russia was the main question. There the largest number of Jews were affected; there the difficulties were at the maximum. At one blow Russia has been eliminated. Of course, betterment for the Russian Jews will not come in a day. It will take time. But the door is open; the barriers have been removed. In common with all other dwellers in Russia, the Jews will have a fair chance. It is impossible to believe that the upheaval will be without influence on Roumania, apart from the fact that Roumania is an ally of the Powers who have proclaimed to the world that the small peoples should be allowed to develop unhindered and unmolested, to the benefit of the countries wherein they dwell as citizens and to the general progress of mankind. The small nations have given great things to the world, and the Jews not the least gifts. Was it not Zangwill who once wrote that one-half of the world worships a Jew and the other half a Jewess?

So far as the Jewish question is concerned, the position becomes fairly simple. Palestine may now take the first place in the minds of all Jews, and a British Palestine ought to, as it will, receive general approbation. The British Palestine Committee steadily continues to inform and win public opinion in this country, and its weekly journal, "Palestine," is finding great favor. This is not remarkable, as the case is excellently well argued, and fortunately the turn of military events in the East is lending support to the activities of the Committee. Jews will have read Sir Stanley Maude's proclamation to the inhabitants of the Bagdad district with great interest. Opinion is unanimous that the document is in the best of taste and significant of what the Allies are fighting for. To be appreciated to the full, it should be read side by side with similar proclamations issued by the Allies' opponents. Perhaps the best instance is the proclamation to the Poles announcing that they were to have a state of their own. The comparison speaks more than volumes, and is bound to open the eyes of even the most obtuse.

One thing, however, should not be overlooked. The revolution in Russia is undoubtedly the harbinger of great things, but Russia is still at war, and the relief to Jewish sufferers that was organized all over the world, is not likely to slacken. In this country the appeal and the response continues. But much is required, for the misery is great. At least the new regime in Russia will call forth greater confidence that the relief funds will reach their destination and be properly expended. Meanwhile the home claims in this country continue to be pressed and met. The latest to hand is from the Committee for the supply of Kosher food to interned Jews, whose work is much appreciated by the authorities no less than by the beneficiaries. Last year the Committee made an appeal for funds and provided Kosher food for interned Jews. The money then collected has been gradually exhausted and no doubt fresh subscriptions will be forthcoming for its continuance.

If this Committee looks after the bodily needs of interned Jews, a new Committee has sprung up in London for the purpose of ministering to the mental requirements of our own people. The Society for the Distribution of Jewish Literature—so the new body calls itself, and it ought to be stated that its originators and prime movers were women. Women's work is usually associated with nursing the sick, visiting the poor, or training children. Here is a body of women that comes forward to do work that may be termed general. Funds were collected with energy, and the first step was the opening of a free reading room with Jewish papers and books. Too long have the missionaries held a monopoly in the field. Within ten minutes' walk from Whitechapel Church there were no less than half a dozen reading rooms conducted by the missionaries. The Whitechapel Public Library is very largely patronized by our youth, both for the purpose of borrowing books for home reading and also for doing school homework. Many a brilliant young scholar must look back with pleasure to the days he spent at the Whitechapel Library. But the missionaries' reading rooms are in a different category. In the first place, they are additional to the excellent reading rooms at the Whitechapel Public Library. In the second place, and this follows naturally, they cater more for the grown up, and have a large assortment of Hebrew and Yiddish books and journals. The Public Library also has an excellent Hebrew Library that is well patronized, and it takes in Yiddish and Hebrew newspapers likewise. Still, the Jewish population of the East End of London is fairly large. Anyhow, the missionaries, knowing the Jews' desire for education and learning, maintain their reading rooms as well. Warm, well lit, comfortable, these places attracted some, but not many readers. Once there the visitors were tackled by the missionaries. It must be admitted that their success was small. But having their buildings, they continued the work. Many years ago the United Synagogue opened a library and reading room in Mulberry Street at the Beth Din center. Concerts and lectures were also provided from time to time, and while a good many people considered that the Jewish Institute was not energetically run, still it was there and provided a want. The newest reading room is a fitting continuation of the work, and we understand that more reading rooms will be opened in due course. Furthermore, the society will distribute pamphlets, leaflets and similar literature in order to place before our young people aspects of their religion and their history. It is work that all sections of the community unite to support.

This unity in helping on good work has more than once suggested to many people that the two wings of Anglo-Jewry might also draw closer together in religious affairs. Very little separates the so-called "orthodox" section from the so-called "reformed" group. In their private life they are all Jews of about the same coloring, much more akin than even High and Low Churchmen. Their Jewish outlook is similar. Yet in their synagogue ritual they differ. The Reformers say many more prayers in English than the orthodox; they have an organ, where the latter have a choir only; officially, the former observes only the first day of the Holy Days, while the orthodox officially celebrate both days, though actually they also keep but one. In a word, the dividing line between the two wings is formal and historical rather than real. Hence the suggestion has been made that they should draw near to each other. As a first step, they might interchange pulpits. If this suggestion materializes, it ought to be a step forward. There is surely great need to dwell on the common bonds.

In the London Lodge a good start has been made under our new president. Many of the brethren have long felt that the lodge ought to provide greater opportunities for social intercourse among the members. It has not been possible to carry out any large schemes during the war period. But at any rate occasional meals before the lodge meetings might well be tried. Brother President Gilbert has lost no time in putting the suggestion before the lodge, and there can be little doubt that it will meet with approval. The commencement will be on a small scale, for many of the brethren are away on active service. But the idea is excellent. Social intercourse among the brethren as brethren is bound in the long run to lead to increased membership. The lodge is the one platform in the Anglo-Jewish community where all shades of opinion can and do meet. The lodge, therefore, stands as the outpost, as it were, of communal solidarity. We have little doubt that under the skillful leadership of the new president its membership roll will lengthen.

The Free Russia

By H. Eliassof

"Russia is free!" Such was the marvelous message which the electric spark recently flashed to all the ends of the earth. It came so suddenly, so unexpectedly, that people listened to the report with abated breath, full of startling surprise, lost in wonder and amazement. Men looked at each other incredulously and asked again and again: "Can this be true?" Even after the good news was repeated and more details of the Russian revolution were given in the dispatches, they still did not believe their own eyes and kept on doubting and distrusting. It was the old "vehem lo yaaminu li,' "'They will not believe me," which Moses, the shepherd liberator of Israel, as the Bible tells us, said to God when he received the message of his mission to tell his people that God is willing to redeem them from Egyptian slavery and lead them to liberty. There is so much suffering in the world and so little joy that the human heart is always more attuned to pain than to pleasure.

Of course, it cannot be denied that the news from Russia sounded so strangely; so much like an echo from distant dreamland, or like a wonderful fairy tale told by the "story lady" to a class of children in a hushed corner of some secluded school house, that people were justified in doubting its veracity. But when the glad tidings were verified and the people convinced of their truthfulness, the world was filled with jubilation.

Yes, it is unbelievable but nevertheless true that Russia, the Egypt of slavery for centuries for millions of men, is a free country at last. The blood-drenched throne of the Romanoff robbers has tottered and tumbled, the fires of hell have been quenched in the smithy of Satan where chains have been forged incessantly for the fettering of the souls of the friends of freedom. The Bastile of brutality where liberty languished, truth was tortured and justice jailed and jaded, has been razed and the dastardly despot, the chief executioner, who was once called Czar Nicholas II, has been caught in the meshes of his own madness, his power is broken, his scepter has become a spectre that now haunts the proud palaces of the cowering crowned heads who still defy the rights of man and it makes them tremble on their tottering thrones. The autocracy of Nicholas II has become a hypocrisy and his sovereignty has turned into shameful self-reproach. This merciless murderer who has caused so many innocent victims of his cruel rule to weep in unutterable woe, is now himself shedding bitter tears in fear and trepidation, as a degraded and dishonored wretch, over whose guilty head hangs the sword of justice ready to mete out the fully earned retribution. In his prison palace he walks around like a shadow and his guilty conscience robs him of his rest, for the shades of the myriads of martyrs for liberty who have found an untimely grave through his treachery are constantly passing in parade before his wakeful eyes, their fleshless fingers wring his heart and in his ears ring their sepulchral voices shouting triumphantly and tauntingly: "Sic semper tyrannis!" "So may it always be with tyrants"!

The story of the Russian revolution can be briefly told and I deem it necessary that it should be told here in order to make it clear what the Russian Jews can expect from the new Russian government. As usual, the Czar and the bureaucracy have been betraying the Russian people for a long time. The people starved, suffered and sighed and pleaded for redress, but the ruler turned a deaf ear to all their pleadings, until affairs in Russia reached an unbearable state. Then Rodzianko, the President of the Duma, sent a special courier to the Czar, demanding in the name of the people that he should dismiss the ministry, and he explained that if the Czar continued to support his Prime Minister, Prince Galizin, the entire responsibility would fall upon himself.

Upon receiving this letter of the President of the Duma, the Czar gave the order to Prince Galizin to dissolve the Duma. The Duma decided to disregard the mandate, and when the people learned of this fight for the life of the Duma, which their representatives were carrying on with the absolute Czar and the arrogant bureacracy, their patience reached the breaking point and the revolution began to rage in the streets of Petrograd and Moscow. The Czar hurriedly left his palace in Tsarkoye Selo and went to his army at the front. In a secret session the Duma appointed a provisional government commission and issued a proclamation to the people, the army and navy, setting forth the state of affairs and urging them all to join in the movement for freeing Russia from the ruinous rule of the Czar and the bureacracy, and after three days of fighting the garrison of Petrograd, about 30,000 soldiers, joined the revolution. Now the Duma, representing the people of Russia, became the dominating agency of government, the reactionary ministers were arrested and a new ministerial cabinet appointed, with Prince Lvoff as Prime Minister and Professor Milyukov as Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The entire revolution was managed by the Duma in such a business-like way and quiet, conservative manner, that the new government quickly gained confidence, influence and power, so that even the Russian church, which was always one of the strongest supporters of the Russian throne, and always helped the Czar to keep the Russian people in subjection, soon surrendered to the new government. The Czar and Czarina were arrested and held prisoners in their palace at Tsarskoye Selo, where their children lay sick, but there was no hysteria, no outbursts of passion and no acts of revenge, which usually attend revolutionary outbreaks.

The leaders of the provisional government have promised to grant equal rights to the Jews alike with all the rest of the Russian population, and the reputation of men like Milyukov, as well as the acts of the other Duma members who have carried the revolution to a successful issue as real representatives of the entire Russian people, in such a liberal and humane manner, furnish ample guarantee that the leaders will see to it that their promises are kept and carried out.

The freed Russian people in their new life of liberty cannot and will not forget that the Russian Jews always helped them to sow the seeds of liberty in Russia, and that now when the successful revolution has redeemed the whole Russian people and brought them all out of the house of bondage, the Jews must share fully in the fruit of the redemption. The Russian people know that the Russian Jews went on a thorny road weeping bitter tears and suffering martyrdom when they carried their measure of the precious seed of freedom, and they now must be welcomed to come with joy into this new life of their country to enjoy the golden sheaves of their country's freedom, their country's material wealth and spiritual elevation, their country's educational opportunities and intellectual advancement.

The reborn and reawakened Russian people know that the Russian Jews have suffered more than enough because they were the friends and brothers of the Russian people, because they loved their country and hated its oppressors, and the Russian people must now gladly recognize the Russian Jews as their true brothers and help to secure them in their well-earned rights so that no so-called "Real Russian" or "Black Hundreds" shall ever deprive them of liberty and life.

The Russian people know that many of the Russian Jews, who have been forced to go into exile by the oppressors and despoilers of Russia, have become useful and desirable citizens wherever they found a refuge and a home and wherever they were permitted and given the chance to lead a life undegraded and unembittered by restrictive laws, a life not made insecure by the fear of pogroms, blood accusations and other fearful false charges, and the Russian people will now hasten to call these scattered children of their newly-born fatherland to come home and help to make the new Russian republic great and glorious in commerce and industry, in statesmanship and political power, in science and art, in the field of finance and in the lanes of labor, in the chambers of law and the halls of learning, as they helped other countries to win wealth and to rise in the respect of the world.

The Jewish citizens of the Republic of the United States of North America therefore joyfully extend the hand of fellowship to the sister Republic of the United States of Russia. All hail to the youngest child of liberty in the midst of the family of free nations!

Mindful of the blessings which we enjoy in common with our fellow citizens let us, with loyal hearts, be ever devoted to our land of civil and religious liberty.

Next unto the duties which we owe to Him to whom we bow in reverence is the duty which we, as citizens of a free land, owe to that government wherein our rights are established and our liberties made secure.

THE IDES OF MARCH.

The great Roman general and statesman, Julius Caesar, heedless of the soothsayer who bade him "beware the ides of March", fell at the hands of republican enthusiasts on the fifteenth day of March. The Northern Caesar of our own days was made to abdicate on the selfsame ides of March. The deposed monarch was famous neither as general nor as statesman. He was known as a weakling, a puppet in the hands of powerful cliques which ruled him, a prey to all sorts of superstitions, and above all a sworn enemy of freedom and progress. The Russo-Japanese muddle revealed the thorough rottenness of the military caste. It fell within his reign. Unable to vanquish the foe abroad, he proved valiant in suppressing revolution at home. We still remember "Bloody Sunday". We have not forgotten his yielding when craven fear overtook him and then recalling the hasty promises of popular government based on freedom of conscience. At last it seems his temporizing policy proved his undoing. We Jews must hold him responsible for all the harshness with which our co-religionists were treated in his vast empire, the pogroms at which his minions connived, the libels which his emissaries concocted, the league which he formed with the dark forces, the hordes of the "Real Russians", the "Black Hundreds", by whose agency he nefariously harassed a peaceful portion of his subjects, through whose instrumentality he hoped to avert the very thing that now has befallen him. He made his pact with lawlessness, and condign penalty has now been meted out to him. He entered upon the world war with foolhardiness, and was ready to betray his trusting allies as well as the interests of his own people. It is not merely as Jews that we rejoice at his downfall. We are not vengeful. We hope that no harm will be done to his person. But we know that his removal was necessary if his country was to be saved from an ignominious fate. We are safe in maintaining that in all lands where law is sacred and liberty revered as a palladium the name of Nicholas II has long been an object of execration, a stumbling-block to the very nations which joined their cause and fortunes to his. We take it that all lovers of free government pray for the success of that [illegible] revolution which made an end [illegible] autocracy. Aye, voices are [illegible] that if the terrible war has led to this great consummation it was worth all the blood that has been shed and all the misery that has followed in its wake. Now it is shown beyond peradventure that our quarrel has never been with the great Russian nation, but rather with its anachronistic despotism which rode rough-shod over the destinies of the people that autocracy might be maintained in defiance of the popular will. The American nation, which remonstrated with the pogrom-stained Petrograd government and would not renew a commercial treaty except on its own just terms, will be ready to deal with the enlightened statesmen now at the helm who have already indicated their disavowal of the very policies which led to the abrogation of the treaty. If the present regime can hold its own, Russian Jewry may with good cause rejoice at the prospect of deliverance from all those discriminations which made their civic life as well as their economic existence unbearable and precarious. To hold its own the regime just inaugurated will have two fronts to contend with. On the one hand the reactionaries will not fold their hands in idle submission. The suddenness of the revolution may have overwhelmed them. By this time they will have emerged from their hiding places. They will plot and proclaim a pogrom against the intellectuals. The Jews will be blamed for it all. Abettors of the revolution they will be called. And an equally grave danger lurks in the attitude of the extremists on the left, the socialists who will inopportunely incite the masses against the classes and with one sweep attempt to set up their Utopias. For these radicals find it hard to learn that political enfranchisement is the business of the hour and is within reach if all the forces opposed to autocracy will hold together, and that the time for urging upon the people their socialistic dreams must come later, and it is safe to say that then the great mass of the nation will recoil from an upheaval which nations that have been politically free for a much longer period have as yet not submitted to. For the sake of the Russian people we hope that moderation will prevail in the counsels of the Socialists. Let them assist in obtaining such results as are immediately realizable. By asking for more they will jeopardize the less. There will certainly be ups and downs to the progress of Russian emancipation from the yoke of autocracy. But ultimately the righteous cause must succeed. The eyes of the world are upon Petrograd and Moscow. The heart of Jewry is palpitating. At last the hour of deliverance seems to have struck. Fallen is the system which enslaved them. Long live the new regime. From across the ocean free America reaches out the glad hand of welcome to liberated Russia. From every Jewish center the world over there goes forth a message of congratulation to Russia and Russian Jews. Perhaps that the Russian people may turn to good purpose the favorable impression thus far created of the turn in their fortunes. The opinion of mankind is an asset. So is the good will of Jews abroad who will readily come forward to help a people struggling to achieve liberty. All this is said without reference to the war. Here we may still take sides. But all Jews will be at one in wishing good speed to the revolution in Russia. For it will mean the salvation of our co-religionists in a country which harbors the greatest number of them and where for some time to come they are bound to make their home, ready to do their best by their country, expecting in return those inalienable rights so long denied them. For the Jews in Russia the ides of March mean a turning point of momentous significance.

INTERESTS PROXIMATE AND ULTIMATE.

In the life of the individual and in the life of nations there are two sets of interests, those that are proximate and those that are ultimate. To live from hand to mouth is the mark of the proletarian. The foresight which provides for the farther days when the strength of the body is diminished, is certainly a virtue. Still the majority of mankind are not given to speculating too far ahead. In general we do not cross a bridge until we come to it. The practical man addresses himself to what is near. Those who look far ahead may be sagacious and accounted wise, but just as often they may be dreamers, who, while the eye is fastened upon the distant, lose contact with things real. The statesmen will tell you that they foresee combinations hidden to the man on the street. Yet how often it happens that they are entrapped in the web of their own scheming, and all the time they are plotting for the future, the present glides through their fingers. Just as it is thoughtless to leave off planning for the future, too much preoccupation with the farther events is to say the least profitless. Yes, when events fashion themselves in accordance with our calculations, we jubilantly exclaim, "I told you so." But just as often our expectations are by no means fulfilled, our fears not a bit justified, and our hopes not at all realized. Naturally we do not advertise our faulty prognostications, our miscarried plans. We all grope in the dark in our humdrum individual lives. And so the most shrewd statesman is found uninformed or misinformed. It is hit or miss quite often indeed. Nor is that all. There is a fallacy abroad as if the individual counted for nothing and the organization meant everything. That the individual should subordinate himself to the state, or the individual member of an organization to that organization, is quite proper. The trouble is not with the organizations demanding loyalty which is theirs by right. The mischief begins when the organization sets itself above its constituents, when it comes to view itself as all-important, when it thinks that the individual is there for it to master, whereas the organization is the servant of its members. Often it is not the organization that becomes overweening, but rather a coterie of individuals speaking in its name. It is then really individual versus individual. It leads to an enslavement of the many by the few who find themselves on the top. Most of us are willing to serve organizations and leaders. But no leader should believe that the organization is in the world solely for the benefit of one or more persons who are born to rule. No aggregate of humanity will thrive unless the rights of all individuals are safeguarded. It is a mistake to view individual interests as proximate and those of an aggregate as ultimate. If all of us were busy serving the so-called larger interests, all society would be soon disorganized for want of attention to the smaller interests of every one of us. The larger interests are best subserved if every one of us attends to his sphere in the most conscientious manner. The social weal means a cumulation of petty interests. But life is made up of a lot of trifles. Moreover, looking too far ahead is a game, and like all games, a hazardous pursuit. Among us Jews there are found the dreamers whose gaze is turned toward the distant. We do not find fault with them. They are a useful element in the community. But it is just as well to remember that they are not the whole community. The things too far away are the things hidden, and the things hidden belong to God. The saner Jews are those who make capital of what the hour offers. They may be nicknamed opportunists. But opportunism is one thing and the opportune taking advantage of a situation which is unique and may not be repeated, quite another. Because the better is in the distance there is no need of disdaining the good that is at hand. What the ultimate fate of the Jewish people is to be is a matter for theologians to settle. But our proximate interests are interwoven with the world as it is today. We are living in days of momentous changes. It will be the highest Jewish statesmanship to watch the opportunity keenly, unselfishly, without delusions and without doctrinairism, with the whole energy that is in us bent upon the attainable. When the proximate interests have been attained, then it will be time enough to tackle the ultimate interests.

SCREW LOOSE SOMEWHERE.

It is a safe guess that there are half a million Jews fighting in European armies. Many Jews from each country at war have been decorated for bravery, even among those from the land, which until lately was under the rule of their arch enemy. No one has questioned their patriotism, and no one has questioned the patriotism of the American Jew, excepting, possibly, Samuel Untermeyer of New York, and some of his friends, by offering to raise a Jewish regiment. Why a Jewish regiment? If there are any people on earth overburdened by would-be leaders and would-be generals it is our people.

The "Hebrew Standard" in its issue of March 9, takes us to task for having devoted an editorial to the slurring criticism of Mr. Cyrus Sulzburger. "The Standard" is right.

PROMINENT B'NAI B'RITH OF NEW HAVEN APPOINTED TO HIGH OFFICE.

Several Jews of the City of New Haven have received appointments to high city and state offices.

Foremost among these is the elevation of Samuel Campner to the position of mayor of New Haven, succeeding the late Mayor Frank J. Rice. Mr. Campner was a prominent young member of the bar, and as president of the board of aldermen during the past year was acting mayor during the illness of the late Mayor Rice. Mr. Campner is only 29 years old—the youngest mayor that New Haven has ever had—a special act of the legislature being required to amend the charter of New Haven in order to enable him to hold the office.

Mr. Campner has been very actively identified throughout his professional career with Jewish activities, as president of Horeb Lodge, I. O. B. B.; as president of the Hebrew Charities, as a director of the Home for the Aged. So far as can be determined Mr. Campner is the first Jewish mayor of any city in the State of Connecticut.

Among the appointments to judgeships recently announced by the legislature at Hartford is that of Jacob Caplan to the position of city court judge of New Haven. Mr. Caplan won out after a spirited contest in the legislature. He is a respected member of the bar, actively associated with Horeb Lodge and the work of District No. 1, I. O. B. B., as well as all the other Jewish activities of the city.

Last among the appointments is that of Abram M. Friedman to the position of deputy to the secretary of state at Hartford. Mr. Friedman has for many years been secretary of Horeb Lodge, I. O. B. B., a popular and energetic figure in the work of the Jewish community of New Haven.

TESTIMONIAL DINNER TO MOSES MINZESHEIMER.

Bro. Moses Minzesheimer, the venerable and honored treasurer of the Home for the Aged at Yonkers, was given a dinner by the Board of Governors on the occasion of his eighty-ninth birthday, March 4, 1917. Bro. Joseph Rosenzweig, President of the District; Bro. Charles Hartman, member of the Executive Committee, and Bro. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, District Secretary, were also present on the occasion. Bro. Myron Sulzberger presided and made an ideal toastmaster. The speeches on the occasion were of a very happy nature. Bro. Minzesheimer expressed his sincere appreciation of the gracious manner in which he was honored by his colleagues.

Among the new books soon to be issued is one by Bro. Simon Wolf, of Washington, D. C., "Reminiscences of the Presidents of the Country He Has Known". The book will be profusely illustrated and the price will be $2.00 per copy. Advance orders for these books can be transmitted direct to Bro. Wolf at Washington.

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

The Executive Committee for an American Jewish Congress met on Sunday, April 1, at the Temple Emanu-El, for the purpose of fixing the date of the Congress, in accordance with the resolution adopted at the first meeting of the Executive Committee, Dec. 25, at Hotel Savoy, which provided that in case the Administrative Committee found it inadvisable to hold the Congress on May 1, the Executive Committee should be convened the first Sunday in April to fix another date.

The different sessions were presided over by Mr. Nathan Straus, chairman of the Executive Committee, and Col. Harry Cutler, chairman of the Administrative Committee. The members present came from a number of different cities.

September 2 was fixed as the date for holding the Congress, with power granted to the Administrative Committee to convene the Congress before or after that date in case of an emergency, by a two-thirds vote. That does not mean, however, that the work in connection with the election of the delegates will be delayed. The plan of elections having been already adopted, immediate action will be taken by the General Board of Elections to form the various district boards of election and to prepare the Jews of this country for the election which will be held on June 10. The following thirteen members constitute the General Board of Elections: Messrs. Meyer L. Brown, Gedalia Bublick, Jacob Carlinger, Joel Enteen, Max L. Hollander, Isaac A. Hourwich, Louis Lipsky, Frank F. Rosenblatt, Bernard A. Rosenblatt, J. B. Salutsky, Solomon Sufrin, Cyrus L. Sulzberger, B. Zuckerman.

It was estimated that a sum of $100,000 would be necessary for the Congress expense. Judge Julian W. Mack, chairman of Committee on Finance, recommended for his committee that this sum be apportioned among the national organizations and the cities which are entitled to delegates, each to pay a pro rata sum for each delegate it sends. In addition, election precincts are required to pay $3.00 for every delegate to the nominating convention, and also 10c for every ballot cast at the election.

The following resolution was cabled to the Provisional Russian government on behalf of the Executive Committee.

April 2, 1917.

GOLDEN WEDDING CELEBRATION OF MR. AND MRS. M. H. MOSES.

Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Moses of New York City celebrated their golden wedding on Feb. 20, 1917. The various organizations with which they have been identified for a great number of years took note of the occasion and presented testimonials to the celebrants.

Mr. Moses has been a member of Hebron Lodge No. 5 of New York, one of the oldest lodges of the Order, for more than 50 years, and has at all times manifested a great deal of interest in the affairs of the Order. The B'nai B'rith News extends congratulations and best wishes to the celebrants.

NEW VICE-PRESIDENT OF PARIS CONSISTORY.

M. Henri Deutsch de la Meurthe has been elected vice-president of the Jewish Consistory of Paris in place of the late M. Narcisse Leven. The new vice-president is a munificent patron of aviation and is president of the Aero Club of France.

SELF-TAXATION FOR JEWS OF MOSCOW.

With the outbreak of the war, the Jews of Moscow installed a system of self-taxation for the purpose of war relief, on the following schedule: Those earning 50 roubles per month, 1 per cent; 100 roubles per month, 1½ per cent; 200 roubles per month, 2 per cent; 300 roubles per month, 3½ per cent; 500 roubles per month, 4 per cent; 700 roubles per month, 5 per cent; 1,000 roubles per month, 6 per cent; over 1,000 roubles per month, 7 per cent.

The Jewish population of Moscow is comparatively small and, therefore, it is interesting to note that in August, 1915, 2,102 persons were paying the tax, the fund amounting to 80,427 roubles per month. In August, 1916, 3,792 persons were paying the tax, which then amounted to 108,889 roubles per month. The total collected for war relief in Moscow from August, 1914, to May, 1916, through self-taxation, amounted to 1,038,000 roubles. The amount raised through ordinary channels for the same period was 228,000 roubles.

AMERICAN JEWRY, AWAKE!

Appeal of the Joint Distribution Committee of Funds for Jewish War Sufferers.

Much attention has been attracted throughout the country by a very unusual appeal issued by the Joint Distribution Committee of the Funds for Jewish War Sufferers, through its chairman, Mr. Felix M. Warburg. The appeal is not merely the stereotyped request for funds for the purposes of war relief, but is an arraignment of the better-off Jews for not giving as liberally as the needs of the situation demand and as their prosperity would seem to justify.

In part the appeal, which is couched in sensational language, says:

"Have American Jews become callous to the suffering of their brothers and sisters, fathers and mothers in the war zones?

"The question is asked in all sincerity.

"Certain it is that our Jewry seems, in large measure, to have lost sight of its manifest duty.

"Has the novelty of giving worn off?

"Does any Jew feel that he has done all that is required of him?

"Do we labor under the delusion that the urgency of the situation is less acute than formerly; that less help is needed; that the pangs of hunger grow fainter with time; that because many have died, the living have ceased to suffer from cold, from starvation?

"If there is any such delusion, it is time it was dispelled.

"From the Jews of every country come appeals born of desperation, asking that the funds be increased—that money be sent quickly or that it may not avail.

"And yet American Jewry, with its own flesh and blood involved in this maelstrom of agony, is complacent, self-satisfied, enjoying every good thing that money can buy, that peace and plenty can provide. In every city in our land Jews continue to enjoy material pleasures, to engage in festivity, to stage social functions, to spend with lavish hands to gratify self, to indulge the vanity, to give evidence of the prosperity that is theirs.

"God of our Fathers!

"It is as though we were making merry in a funeral house.

"A moment's delay is fatal. The Joint Distribution Committee, through its treasurer, but a few weeks ago sent to Europe and Palestine every dollar that was in the treasury. No other action could have been taken in view of the appeals that came by cable, came by wireless and came by letter. The action also was taken because it was then feared severance of diplomatic relations with Germany might make it difficult to transmit funds in the immediate future and with help from America cut off there would have been but one result, the Grim Reaper would have harvested his full crop of the helpless souls of Jewish babes, Jewish mothers, Jewish boys and girls and the Jewish aged.

"The result will yet be the same, unless we conquer our indifference, unless we quicken our sympathies, unless we can picture to ourselves the misery which everywhere but in America, in greater or less degree, afflicts our race; unless we do away with selfishness, unless we prepare to sacrifice, to determine what each of us can give and to give that sum systematically, steadily, without regret. Not with the thought that we are generous, not that we deserve credit for our liberality, but that we are merely doing our duty; that we are doing that which is expected of us; that which our faith teaches us we must do, if we would not be recreant to our trusts; that which is imperative, if the blight of war, already crushing the innocent of our Faith, is not to overwhelm and to obliterate them.

"At every place where a few of us gather together, either for pleasure, for business, or for religious observance, let us pause, if only for a moment, to give thought to the helpless and suffering; let us put ourselves in their place and then let us open our hearts and open our pocketbooks and give what we can afford, give all that we can give with the utmost sacrifice; let us give up some of our luxuries, some of our unnecessary diversion, some of our comforts that the starving may have a crust of bread, a bowl of soup, at least once a day; that the cold may for a few hours have their bodies warmed; that the wan, thin faces of little children may lose a little of their gauntness; that our aged fathers and mothers may not be turned away empty handed from the bread lines; that bodies may be covered with a few rags to save them from the bitter wind; that the shelterless may have a place in which to rest their weary bones.

"American Jewry, awake! You and you alone can answer the prayer put by suffering millions!

"Feed us! Save us"!!

PORTLAND B'NAI B'RITH LODGES TENDERED A TESTIMONIAL BANQUET TO DAVID N. MOSESSOHN.

More than 250 members of the Order and their ladies attended the banquet tendered on Sunday evening, March 4, 1917, at the Hotel Multnomah by the B'nai B'rith Lodges of Portland and their ladies' auxiliaries to the newly elected President of the District Grand Lodge, Mr. David N. Mossessohn. The banquet hall was draped with American flags and the tables decorated with flowers. The menu cards contained a likeness of the guest of honor.

Rev. R. Abrahamson delivered prayer, and between courses of a most delicious dinner, a musical program was rendered. At the close of the dinner, the toastmaster read a number of congratulatory messages from the Governor of Oregon, the Mayor of Portland, the Portland Chamber of Commerce, the Secretary of State, and all the officers of the District Grand Lodge. Judge Kraemer made an ideal toastmaster.

Dr. A. Tilzer responded to the toast of "Our Grand President." He told most interestingly of various reminiscences of the youth of his subject, eulogizing most particularly his parents. He closed by proposing a toast to Dr. and Mrs. N. Mosesson, which all responded to by rising.

"Our Boys" was dealt with by Charles W. Robison. In his usual vigorous style Mr. Robison told of the "old" boys and of the young boys and paid tribute to the Grand President when the latter was a member of the district attorney's office, stating that the present juvenile court laws were largely laid down by Mr. Mosessohn when he had this work in charge.

A masterful address on the "B"nai B'rith" was given by D. Solis Cohen, the Grand Orator. He told of the ideals of the Order and dealt with its future. He held his audience in a trance as he pleaded for more united action and closer cooperation. He stated that it was the duty of the organization to see that in the readjustment which will follow the European war, that the Jews be recognized.

During his response to the toast, "Brotherhood In and Out of the Synagogue", Rabbi Jonah B. Wise played on the gamut of emotions of his audience. First paying a graceful tribute to the guest of the evening, he next kept his hearers laughing with a few pointed anecdotes. Then plunging into a statement of the country's crisis, he brought the audience to its feet with a pledge of support to the President of the United States. He said:

"Today in Washington a man is laying his hand upon the Bible and swearing to support the customs of the United States. It is not a matter of small moment that the book used in such ceremonies is our book. It is a matter of great moment to us that we are assembled here, that the light of the Menorah shines upon the Stars and Stripes. The President has the privilege; we have given it to him, to command our person and wealth for the safety and honor of these United States".

The guest of honor, David N. Mosessohn, then responded, thanking those present for their expression of esteem and pleading for co-operation in making his term of office a success. A pertinent statement was that the B'nai B'rith Order was the greatest exponent of the "Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man" now existent, and that it stood for patriotism to the country and to the flag.

After the banquet an informal dance was given, which was greatly enjoyed.

Many compliments were bestowed on B. W. Rubin, the master of ceremonies, and those who assisted him, for the manner in which the affair was arranged and conducted.

HONORS FOR ITALIAN JEWS.

Various Italian coreligionists have recently been the recipients of honors from the government. Among them are Cavaliere Moise Foligno, of Ancona, a former president of that community and now resident in Milan, who has been made commander of the Order of the Crown of Italy. A similar honor has been paid to another resident of Milan, Advocate Angelo Barzilai. Other recipients of this honor are Dr. Corrado Segre, Professor of Higher Geometry at the University of Turin, and member of the Royal Academy of Science of that city; Professor Aronne Torre, inspector under the Ministry of Public Instruction, and Cavaliere Lelio Fubine, who fills many Jewish and general offices. Recent nominations to the rank of Cavalier of the same order are Professor Adolfo Colombo, Advocate Michele Ottolenghi of Turin, and Signor Dario Levi of Rome.

GOLDEN JUBILEE EZEKIEL LODGE No. 90, I. O. B. B., OF NEWARK, N. J.

The golden jubilee of Ezekiel Lodge No. 90 of Newark, N. J., was fittingly celebrated on Sunday evening, Feb. 25, with a banquet given at the Progress Club of that city. The ceremonies of this celebration were commenced on Friday evening, Feb. 23, at the Temple Oheb Sholem. Dr. Chas. I. Hoffman, its Rabbi, gave a special B'nai B'rith service and addressed his congregation on the subject, "Applied Judaism", during which he emphasized the influence of the Order in regard to its material strength in combining all the different factions of the Jewish religion into a common brotherhood and as a strong adjunct of the synagogue.

On Sunday morning services were conducted at Temple B'nai Jeshurun by Rabbi Solomon Foster and Rev. Maurice Cowan. A beautiful program was arranged, during which 300 children of the religious school acted as a choir. Vocal selections were rendered by Miss Henrietta Metzger, Myra Cohn, Beatrice Epstein and Miriam Joseph. A most impressive address was given by Rabbi Isadore Rosenthal of Lancaster, Pa., who spoke on "Our Ideals".

The address was so well received that many in the audience for the moment were so carried away by his eloquence that they forgot the occasion was a religious service and applauded.

In the afternoon the executive officers of the Grand Lodge were in session at the Robert Treat Hotel. Mr. Fred Jay, as president of District No. 3, presided. Among those present were Mr. Jacob Singer, Philadelphia, Pa.; Dr. B. S. Pollock, Jersey City; Mr. M. S. Meyerhoff, Grand Treasurer; Mr. David Bortin, Second Vice-President; Mr. Harry Platowsky, Philadelphia, Pa.; Rabbi Isadore Rosenthal, Lancaster, Pa.; Mr. Adolph Edlis, Pittsburgh. Pa.; Mr. Morris Schaffner, Erie, Pa.; Mr. Marcus Feuchtwanger, New Castle, Pa., First Vice-President; Mr. Edward Hempel, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Louis Sulzbacher, Grand Secretary, Braddock, Pa.; Mr. Armin Friedman, McKeesport, Pa.; Mr. Leon B. Stein, Wheeling, W. Va. After the executive session adjourned the members were escorted to the Progress Club and they participated in the banquet, which included the following program:

The opening prayer was given by Rabbi [illegible] Leucht, who is Rabbi Emeritus [illegible] Temple B'nai Jeshurun. The address of welcome by Mr. Herman Steiner, president of Ezekiel Lodge. Rabbi Foster made a brilliant and entertaining toastmaster. Mr. Fred Jay, as president of the district, responded to the toast, "Our District". Mrs. Rose Wolff, the first president of the Ladies' Auxiliary of Ezekiel Lodge, responded to the toast, "Our Gentlemen". Mr. Daniel P. Hayes of New York on "The Layman in Judaism" was well received. Rabbi Julius Silberfeld of the Temple B'nai Abram delivered a most eloquent and stirring address, "The Racial Jew", reminding his audience that were it not for the racial distinctions of the Jewish people such men as Disraeli, Heine, and others of equal distinction, would have been lost to our people with their conversion to Christianity, which, however, was not the case; we still claim them as our own. One of the surprises of the evening was the information imparted to the audience by Mr. Nat Bilder, a local lawyer and past president of Ezekiel Lodge, who spoke on the subject, "The Anti-Defamation League". Very few in the gathering were familiar with the wonderful results the League has accomplished, such as the suppressing of moving picture films, which portray the Jew in unfavorable characters, objectionable news items, advertisements detrimental to our people, etc. Mr. Bilder is the local representative of the League and his address was very well received.

Rev. Dr. Edw. N. Calisch of Richmond, Va., the principal speaker of the evening, was introduced as the silver-tongued orator of the South, and during his most eloquent address on "The Aims of Our Order" convinced his hearers that his reputation was well deserved.

Rabbi Chas. I. Hoffman, as Past President of District No. 3, spoke on "Emerging from Provincialism". At the conclusion of this program, Dr. B. S. Pollak delivered a beautiful testimonial to Mr. Fred Jay, the Grand President of the District, on his work in behalf of the Order, and presented him with a handsome silver fruit basket, the gift of Ezekiel Lodge. A beautiful floor lamp was presented to Mr. Herman Steiner, president of the lodge, as a token of appreciation. The presentation was fittingly made by Mr. Benj. J. Sugarman. Mr. M. S. Meyerhoff, the Grand Treasurer of the District, was the recipient of an engrossed set of resolutions in testi- [illegible] untiring efforts in conserving [illegible] the endowment fund. [illegible] dancing followed.

With a toast to the President of the United States, in a room hung with national colors, 150 members of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith on March 25, 1917, pledged anew their allegiance to the flag and the government of which it is the symbol.

The occasion was the golden jubilee of Jacob Lodge No. 91 of Syracuse which celebrated with a banquet at the Temple, the fiftieth anniversary of its institution. Many matters relating to the welfare and growth of the order were discussed by the various speakers but loyalty and devotion to the principles of freedom were emphasized in all the addresses. Recent political happenings in Russia were looked upon as indicative of a great step forward in the struggle for emancipation of a people who have suffered long under distressing conditions of government.

New Field Opened.

William Rubin, who was toastmaster, pointed out that the revolution in Russia had opened a wide field of new activity for the organization. They had not been permitted, he said, under the conditions heretofore existing to formally extend their work in Russia, but with the overthrow of the monarchy and the advent of a degree of freedom hitherto unknown to Russian Jews, the work of B'nai B'rith for a general betterment of conditions could be carried forward rapidly and advantageously. He urged on all members of the Order the necessity for co-operation in the work of accomplishing the results for which, he said, the B'nai B'rith was founded.

Emanuel Bronner, president of Jacob Lodge, in welcoming the members to the feast, said: "In the beginning God said 'let there be light,' and there was light.' Darkness was scattered, night was turned into day and it was given to man to see. Throughout the ages strife for knowledge has played an important part in our history. Real culture has had its reward and today, amid the roar of cannons and the butchery of our fellow beings abroad, we of America, having seen the light, pray for the uplift of man to a higher sense of his obligations to God and his fellow beings.

Proud of Success.

"We of Syracuse are proud of the success which has crowned our parents and our parents' parents. In order that we may sustain the brotherhood of man, the world, nations, states and municipalities must recognize the obligations of reciprocity. The Jew has always felt the hand and sometimes the sword of a prejudiced and biased people; but, thank God, in this free land of ours, day after day we feel this prejudice less".

President Joseph Rosenzweig, of the District Grand Lodge, congratulated the Lodge on the acquisition of forty-one new members, whose incoming had been announced during the day. Mr. Rosenzweig spoke of what the Order had accomplished in the way of prison reform and the extension of the big brother movement and referred, as did the other speakers, to the unusual opportunities now opening for the enlargement of their good works.

Grand Secretary Dr. Bernard Kaplan of New York, reviewed to some extent the history of the organization and dwelt on the necessity for earnest, co-operative effort in maintaining the high ideals upon which the Order was founded. The ideals of B'nai B'rith, he said, were the ideals of Judaism. "The revolution in Russia", said Mr. Kaplan, "is more than a revolution. It is a revelation. At last our brothers in Eastern Europe will enjoy liberty as we enjoy it".

Plays False Philosophy.

The causes most responsible for the war in Europe were discussed by T. Aaron Levy, who said that a band of false philosophers had been teaching and preaching the gospel of might. "It is surprising", said Mr. Levy, "that the war did not come sooner than it did. Today we must say of conditions in Europe, as was said of old, that the judgments of the Lord are just and right altogether. Wars will stop when we practice what we preach".

As a part of the birthday celebration of Jacob Lodge special services were held in the morning at the Temple Society of Concord, at which the grand president, Joseph Rosenzweig, was the principal speaker.

DISTRICT No. 8.

Commercial Councillor Norbert Levy, of Berthold Auerbach Lodge, I. O. B. B., Berlin, Germany, has forwarded to the German Grand Lodge 10,000 marks in war loan certificates for the purpose of establishing a foundation. The seat is to be in Berlin, and its aim is to furnish relief to those who were injured in the war or to their relatives.

25TH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF B. F. PEIXOTTO LODGE.

One of the most elaborate affairs in the history of the Jews in Utah was held in the Hotel Utah, Salt Lake City, on March 11, 1917, in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of B. F. Peixotto Lodge No. 421. The celebration consisted of a banquet and ball. The hall was decorated with American flags and the tables with flowers.

Mr. Louis Marcus presided and introduced the toastmaster, Mr. L. E. Jacobs, a charter member of the lodge, who, in his opening remarks, reviewed the history of the lodge.

Among the speakers were Mr. Daniel Alexander, whose subject was "Benevolence". Mr. Ezra Bear discussed "Brotherly Love", and Mr. Simon Shapiro spoke on "Harmony". Rabbi Wm. Rice spoke of the "Jews of Utah", and Mr. M. Wolff, a charter member of the lodge, on the subject, "Friendship".

Gov. Ralph Bamberger was the last speaker. Among the thoughts that he expressed was that the Jew should guard well his reputation, for while he may prove a credit to the Jews, it is absolutely necessary that the Jews prove a credit to him.

The principal address was delivered by Mr. Max Aaron, the president of the lodge. Mr. Aaron, in reviewing the history of the lodge, said in part, as follows:

"Exactly today, a quarter of a century ago, the pioneers of our Jewish community, in organizing Peixotto Lodge, placed a golden link in the long chain of benevolent lodges which constitute the Independent Order of the B'nai B'rith. For 25 years our lodge has assisted in relieving distress, has aided in educating the ignorant, and has given a helping hand toward coming to the rescue of the victims of persecution. For 25 years our lodge has done its share in uplifting the mental and moral character of our brethren, and for 25 years our lodge has been the advocate of peace among ourselves and among mankind. It is impossible to enumerate the various deeds performed through the deliberations in our lodge room. It seldom occurs to us the wonders our Order has accomplished through our 25 years of labor, together with the labors of our sister lodges throughout the universe. The aged and infirm mumble their blessings upon us; the immigrant has us to thank for smoothing his pathway to citizenship in a free land. Through our efforts the orphan becomes the admired genius, the consumptive's life is prolonged, the rheumatic is relieved of his pain and the student is quenched of his thirst for knowledge. All over the world, through our efforts, hospitals, infirmaries, asylums and schools are established.

"Our membership consists exclusively of unselfish Jews, regardless of the extent of their religion. We are blessed with the brotherhood of Jews who are kings of the pulpit and platform. We have a justice in the United States Supreme Court, ambassadors to other lands, and a governor in our home state. This last fact is made the special feature of the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of our lodge. In celebrating the silver anniversary of our lodge we celebrate the inauguration of one of its members as governor of the state. The B'nai B'rith points with pride to it's genius in arts and science and to its prominent statesmen.

"In the celebration of this event we manifest the honor of having Gov. Bamberger as a member of our lodge; we proclaim our devotion and allegiance to him, and we delight in his personal acquaintance and brotherly love. This should deepen the confidence and admiration of the people of Utah toward their governor, for the man who is liked most by those who know him best is the man who should be liked by all. We are proud of his brotherhood, not because he is governor, and not alone because he is a Jew, but because he has demonstrated the fact that he has gained recognition as a gentleman of the highest standard of moral character, regardless of his race or of his ancestors' condition of servitude, and it is fitting to remark that we are grateful to the people of Utah for regarding a gentleman as a gentleman."

A meeting of the Board of Governors of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3 was held at the Rodef Shalom Temple, Pittsburgh, Pa., on Sunday, March 11. The campaign now being conducted by Rabbi Silver in West Virginia to make good the pledge made during the Erie convention on behalf of West Virginia of $6,000 towards the indebtedness on the buildings is now being carried on by the Rabbi and an appeal was made in Huntington on Tuesday. From indications more than the six thousand dollars pledged will be subscribed.

From the reports of the officers and chairmen of committees, the work of the Orphanage is progressing favorably. The health of the children is normal and the educational feature is being given considerable prominence, not only in English, but in the Hebrew.

Since the institution of our Orphanage several subscriptions have been made in the memory of departed persons, and in every case of this kind, where the amount of the donation or bequest is more than one hundred dollars, Kaddish is repeated for the departed person on each anniversary. This fact is not generally known to the public and we are glad to obtain the use of the columns of this paper to give this information. It also might be well to mention that the dietary laws in the preparation of food is in strict accord with that of the ancient Jewish law, and that this has been observed since the first day of the opening of our institution.

Mr. Louis Goldsmith of Pittsburgh was elected a member of the Board. Miss Julia Hess of St. Paul has been elected field secretary and has visited the several cities of New Jersey and of eastern Pennsylvania and has met with very encouraging results, and it is expected that before July 1 she will visit the remaining cities of Pennsylvania.

It is intended to recognize some of the splendid gifts that have been presented to our institution in the furnishing of our buildings, particularly some of the large permanent gifts as that of Braddock Lodge No. 516, I. O. B. B., Braddock, Pa., and McKeesport Lodge No. 573, I. O. B. B., McKeesport, Pa., each of these lodges having furnished a complete cottage, and the magnificent refrigerator donated by Mr. Robert Lewin of Pittsburgh, as well as several other gifts. Among the contributions for the building fund was $100 received from Mr. Julius Hertz of Pittsburgh, Pa.

B'NAI B'RITH OF KANSAS CITY.

Kansas City Lodge No. 184, of Kansas City, Mo., held its regular monthly cultural meeting at the Temple on Monday evening, March 12. The meeting was largely attended and those present were furnished a rare treat by the committee in charge of the program.

A recitation by Miss Rich and a vocal solo by Miss Rabin were rendered in excellent form, and the audience showed its appreciation by demanding several encores. The evening ended with a social session and with the serving of refreshments.

Mr. Edgar J. Stern was unanimously elected to serve as secretary of the lodge to fill the vacancy caused by Mr. W. W. Wachtel.

The Big Brother Movement is taking firm hold of the Kansas City brothers and steps are being taken now to formulate a strong organization to cope with this work. Mr. J. C. Reefer, as chairman of the local Big Brother Committee, is working untiringly so that his committee may be able to meet the demands which are being made upon it. Several little brothers have already been placed, and the committee is holding a very optimistic outlook for the future in this work. Mr. Herman Passamaneck is acting secretary for the committee.

BOSTON, MASS.

The Jewish people of Boston are deeply indebted to the local B'nai B'rith lodges for the recent visit of Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee of Chicago, Social Service Director. His stay in Boston, covering three days, has been of great value and help to our local lodges. As the guest of Massachusetts Lodge No. 27 and Amos Lodge No. 121, Dr. Coffee occupied the pulpit of Congregation Ohabei Shalom on Friday evening, March 9. His subject was "Judaism and Social Service," explaining the exact nature of the new work which the B'nai B'rith had undertaken somewhat more than a year ago. Emphasizing the fundamental principles of the Big Brother Movement at great length, Dr. Coffee said that a chain of such organizations in American cities would greatly lessen the number of Jewish delinquents. By statistics and by personal citations the fine and constructive work of this movement was clearly pointed out. Then he touched upon the work of prison reform. Mr. Thomas Mott Osborne told the speaker that were it not for the loyal support of the Jewish boys in New York prisons the Mutual Welfare League could never have achieved its great success. Our religion, unlike most other faiths, is based on deed, on work and on social service. We emphasize creed and dogma to a minimum degree. The B'nai B'rith lays the greatest stress on its Jewishness when it encourages its members to undertake social service labors.

Dr. Coffee preached from the same pulpit on Sabbath morning on the subject, "Religion Tomorrow". Sunday morning, March 11, he addressed the congregation of Rabbi Harry Levy in Temple Israel on "Can We Abolish Poverty"? Both sermons emphasized various phases of B'nai B'rith work. Saturday evening a joint meeting was held at the City Club under the auspices of the two B'nai B'rith lodges. Members interested in Social Service activities had been invited to attend, and the large number present showed a deep interest being taken in Social Service work. Bro. Leon L. Silbert, president of Amos Lodge, called the meeting to order and then turned the chair over to Bro. Jacob Wasserman, president of Massachusetts Lodge. As the first speaker of the evening Bro. Wasserman called upon Dr. Coffee. The message which Dr. Coffee brought was along practical lines. He explained how the Big Brother movement is working in other cities and could be conducted in Boston. He laid special emphasis upon the newsboy problem, for in many cities throughout the country the great majority of newsboys are Jewish lads. He felt that some system should and could very easily be arranged whereby every Jew on release from the prison could be provided with work and given the friendship of a Big Brother. He spoke of the new work along the lines of educating and Americanizing the immigrant. Boston offers a very fertile field for splendid activity and the past work along Social Service lines in Boston should be enlarged at the earliest possible date. The round table discussion was exceedingly interesting. Mr. David M. Claghorn, Social Director of the Y. M. C. A., and Albert J. Sargent, Chief Probation Officer of the Municipal Court, emphasized the fine and constructive lines of activity which the speaker had outlined. Mr. Lee Lyon, Mr. Carl Dreyfus, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Training Schools of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Rabbi P. Israeli, Judge A. K. Cohen, past president of District No. 1, Rabbi M. M. Eichler and Mr. Moses L. Sedar, Chaplain of State Institutions and Chairman of the Boston Social Service Committee, were among those who addressed the meeting. Much credit for the success of Doctor Coffee's visit is due to Brother Leon L. Silbert, under whose able direction the various arrangements were made.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

The Charity Ball given under the auspices of Harmony Lodge No. 711, of Bridgeport, Conn., on Feb. 28, 1917, was a brilliant success. The event was arranged by the lodge for the benefit of the three Jewish charities of the city, which carry on a far-reaching philanthropic work. A very pleasing feature of the affair was the presence of the master violinist, Eugene Ysaye, in whose honor Mr. and Mrs. Charles Shapiro gave a supper during the intermission.

The lodge, in addition to the charitable endeavors, will inaugurate a campaign for a thousand names for the Bridgeport Red Cross branch.

During the evening professional entertainers proved a delight and during the intermission a buffet supper was served. At the close of the evening an American flag was produced and the entire attendance arose and sang "America" and the "Star Spangled Banner".

During the recent convention of District Grand Lodge No. 4 action was taken for the formation of a Lecture Bureau to exploit and promote the work of the Order in the various states comprising the western jurisdiction. This was done upon the recommendation of President Newberg, who pointed out the immense value of such a bureau, making it possible for the younger as well as the older members to become acquainted with the unselfish and magnificent work of the Order.

Several prizes were offered for card games, after which refreshments were served. The main purpose of the gathering was, however, the forming of a ladies' auxiliary. Bro. H. E. Kaufman outlined briefly the importance of such a branch to aid the lodge in its work. The names of forty prospective charter members were secured and it is expected that the auxiliary will be fully established shortly.

As a result of the destruction by fire of the lodge premises known as the Modern Woodman Hall, in which Nebraska Lodge No. 354 of Omaha held its regular meetings, Nebraska Lodge lost all of its property, including paraphernalia, which, however, was insured to a small extent. The serious loss incurred by the lodge consists of memorial pictures valued at over $1,000, which were not insured.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SEATTLE.

A regular meeting of Rainier Lodge No. 627 was held on Tuesday, Feb. 13, 1917, at which much business was transacted and at which the attendance was larger than usual. President S. Ostrow has inaugurated several innovations, among them introduced by him was a roll call of members at each meeting. This has been the means of attracting much larger audiences than formerly. Various members addressed the lodge, among them the president, who gave an outline of the year's work. Reports of committees were entertained, among them recommendations of the Social Committee for the holding of an affair in the near future.

Hildesheimer Lodge No. 503 held its regular meeting on Feb. 14. The meeting was well attended and proved an interesting one. A class of candidates was initiated in a most pleasing and efficient manner by the new officers of the lodge who displayed a masterly knowledge of the impressive ritual work.

Various committee reports were received and acted upon. Among them the report of the Social Committee recommending the holding of a Purim festival and annual dance in conjunction with the Emma Lazarus Auxiliary. A committee was appointed to confer with a like committee of Rainier Lodge to arrange a date and plans for a B'nai B'rith night during the Bazaar to be given by the Congregation Bikur Cholim. Various short talks by members of the lodge were made.

At the recent meeting of Rainier Lodge No. 627. Brother Sam Schwabacher, who was appointed to take charge of the Big Brother Movement in Seattle, outlined the scope of such a movement, and pointed out the vast amount of good that can be accomplished if Jewish delinquents were taken under the personal charge of Big Brothers who would make it their business to act as a friend to them. He called upon the members of the Lodge to assume this new obligation and assured them that they will have as a reward the satisfaction and gratification of seeing these little brothers grow and develop into strong, clean and upright men.

A meeting of Rainier Lodge of Seattle was held on March 13, 1917, and a class of candidates was initiated. The initiation ceremony was conducted in a most efficient manner by the new Degree Team under the leadership of Brother A. J. Cohn. The President of the Lodge announced the appointment of the various standing committees for the year. Emanuel Rosenberg made a splendid report of the proceedings of the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 4. Bros. Ralph Schoenfeld and P. Bornstein made short addresses in the course of which they presented valuable suggestions.

The entertainment committee reported that arrangements had been completed for the annual ball to be given by the lodge on April 1.

PISGAH LODGE, DETROIT.

The Intellectual Advancement Committee of Pisgah Lodge No. 34 of Detroit, Mich., is planning a big affair. It is proposed to initiate a class of 100 candidates, on which occasion the degree team of Toledo Lodge, O., is to officiate. The committee plans also to arrange for a dinner on that occasion and to conclude the day's program at the Hotel Statler.

MEMPHIS LODGE, MEMPHIS, TENN.

Memphis Lodge No. 35 of Memphis, Tenn., adopted a novel plan in its intellectual advancement work. Instead of selecting a single speaker for the annual B'nai B'rith Day celebration, the lodge decided to go among its single members and ask each one of them to select their own subject, but to restrict the subjects to be discussed to the general theme of "Suggestions of Vital Interest to Judaism". The program was so titled and each speech was limited to ten minutes' duration. After the conclusion of the addresses it was found that the following subjects were discussed: Mr. Waldauer spoke on "Zionism", Mr. Block on "Social Settlement Work", Mr. Strauss on "The Early History of the Order and of Memphis Lodge", Mr. Hirsch on "Big Brother Work", and Mr. Lessner on "Solidarity of the Jews".

The program aroused a great deal of interest and resulted in making the meeting most enjoyable.

Memorial Day was observed by Memphis Lodge on Sunday morning, March 11. The program included the reading of the names of deceased members of the lodge and an address by the president of the lodge. This was followed by the reading of the prize essay written by Moses Schwartz, entitled "Why Every Jew Should be a Member of the B'nai B'rith". A short discussion was also had on the subject "Should the B'nai B'rith Remain a Secret Order"? The discussion was led by S. L. Lee and Hon. J. G. Strauss.

Preceding the program a class of twelve candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

HOPE LODGE, STOCKTON.

Under the auspices of Hope Lodge No. 126, of Stockton, Cal., an entertainment was given in the early part of the month of March which was declared by all present to be one of the most successful affairs given by the organization. The program included musical and vocal numbers, and as a result of the affair a large sum was realized for the benefit of suffering coreligionists in the European war zones. The evening's program was brought to a close with dancing and serving of refreshments.

Hope Lodge No. 126, of Stockton, Cal., has appointed a committee on "A Building Site" to investigate the advisability and practicability of securing a permanent home for the Lodge.

At the last meeting of the Lodge, Brother Emil Gumpert delivered a remarkable address on the subject, "Why I am a Ben B'rith". His address awoke large applause and proved interesting and educational.

MAIMONIDES LODGE, NASHVILLE, TENN.

An audience exceeding 225 members, in addition to their ladies and families, assembled in the vestry room of the Temple, at Nashville, Tenn., on the occasion of the B'nai B'rith celebration, under the auspices of Maimonides Lodge. The meeting was called to order by President Julius Abrams, and prayer was offered by Dr. Lewenthal. Past President Mr. Nathan Cohn, of District Grand Lodge No. 7, was toastmaster. Addresses were made by the following:

Jos. Lightman — "Why Everybody Should Be a Ben B'rith".

Simon Lieberman—"Progress of the Jew".

Jacob Levine—"Increasing the Membership".

Dr. Lewenthal—"The Good That Our Order is Doing in This Country and Europe".

The meeting was a great success and much enthusiasm was aroused.

GULF LODGE, NEW ORLEANS.

The dedication of the new lodge rooms followed the initiation and was opened with appropriate remarks and a short resume of the growth and development of the Order by Bro. Solomon Marx. The address of the evening was delivered by Dr. Mendel Silber, who spoke on "Jewish Solidarity and B'nai B'rith".

At the close of the program supper was served.

Hunter, chief probation officer of the Juvenile Court, addressed the gathering on "How Boys May Be Kept Out of the Courts". At the conclusion of the addresses the lodge moved to appropriate the sum of $500 as its proportionate share of the expenses to establish the summer camp. The lodge also appropriated the sum of $150 to the charity fund of the Central B'nai B'rith Council.

Ramah Lodge.

At an unusually well attended meeting of Ramah Lodge No. 33, held on Monday evening, March 12, 1917, at Hotel La Salle, Prof. Edward Chauncey Baldwin, of the University of Illinois, gave a lecture on the subject, "A Message from Israel's Prophets for Today". The address was followed by a discussion of the syllabus submitted by the director of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, entitled "The Care of the Orphan". The discussion was led by Bro. Adolph Kurz, president of the Jewish Home Finding Society of Chicago, who advocated as the best of caring for orphans either the adoption of orphans by well-to-do people, subsidizing widowed mothers so as to enable them to keep their children, and placing them out with private families to be cared for.

Bro. Judge Philin Stein, president of the Jewish Orphan Asylum, Cleveland, gave a brief review of the work of that institution during its more than forty years of existence, and strongly emphasized the beneficial results achieved by the methods in vogue in the institution.

The last speaker was Bro. L. Deutelbaum, superintendent of the Home for Jewish Orphans of Chicago, who read a paper on the subject, "The Care of the Orphan", strongly advocating institutional care of orphans as the best means.

All the speakers were voted a vote of thanks by the lodge, and it was resolved to continue the discussion at the next meeting.

The two top floors of the building, being the third and fourth floors, are now being entirely remodeled to suit the purposes of the club. All the necessary equipment and furniture have been purchased, and it is expected that the doors of the club will be opened on May 1 next.

At the first annual meeting of the club held in the latter part of March, the election of officers took place with the following result: President, Morton A. Mergentheim; first vice-president, Henry S. Blum; second vice-president, Theodore Geissmann; secretary, Mark D. Goodman; treasurer, Maurice Taussig. A board of directors, consisting of twenty-one members, were also elected.

Under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago, representing the local lodges, a Mardi Gras Ball was given at Hotel La Salle on Saturday evening, March 24, 1917. The affair was attended by over 1,500 members and their friends and was a pronounced success. Prizes were distributed.

HUNTINGTON WEST VIRGINIA.

On Sunday evening, March 18, the largest and most representative gathering of Jewish people which Huntington has seen in years turned out to hear Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director. The meeting was held under the auspices of Huntington Lodge No. 795, and was open to the general public. Mr. David Gideon was called upon to act as chairman and in an appropriate speech, introduced Doctor Coffee. Commenting on the fact that many West Virginia soldiers had just returned from the Mexican border, the speaker chose as his theme, "Soldiers of Peace, Not of War". These thousands of brave soldiers, said Doctor Coffee, who are in Huntington tonight waiting to be mustered out on the morrow, have been carefully prepared for war. I wonder how many of them are prepared for the battles of peace. Our war is not against the visible enemy. The B'nai B'rith fights the invisible foe, poverty, disease, sin and ignorance. The aim of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is to assist Jewish brethren in America to become self-reliant that they become worthy citizens. Instead of building hospitals all over the land, we hope that by providing a man with a good occupation and assisting him through friendship, he will be able to enjoy life and ward off sickness. We encourage the attendance of immigrants at night echool and the giving of Big Brothers to boys who lack parental guidance at home. By these and other means we train our people to be soldiers of peace. Give every boy an even chance, help every man to become self-supporting.

A reception was held at the conclusion of the lecture and later on dancing was participated in by the younger folks. The following morning Doctor Coffee was in consultation with Brothers David Fox, Doctor L. Polan, Harry A. Glick and H. Solomon, who will develop such social service activities as may be carried out in Huntington.

UNIONTOWN, PA.

The large and growing community of Uniontown was greatly benefitted by a visit from Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Chicago, Social Service Director of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. The new campaign to awaken interest among local Jews received a fine impetus from the scholarly and interesting talk which Doctor Coffee gave in the City Hall on Thursday evening, March 22. The meeting was called to order by Brother Max J. Lavinsky, who introduced Brother Rabbi Julius Shappo as chairman. The speaker concluded his remarks by introducing Doctor Coffee, whose theme was "The New B'nai B'rith Work". In many communities of America, such as Uniontown, there will be Jews with differing opinions. Some are interested in traditional and others in reform Judaism. The B'nai B'rith recognizes the right of and encourages each Jew to affiliate with the Synagogue representing his religious convictions. While, however, there may be differences along lines of doctrines, all will agree to the importance of Social Service as an integral part of Judaism. Our religion minimizes creed, but emphasizes deed. During the past seventy-three years of its proud history, our Order has done fine philanthropic work. The new step is a broadening of our past activities. We are not alone to send our contributions to various institutions, we now call upon our members to volunteer their services. If a man is released from prison, let us find him a place. If a boy is reported before the Juvenile Court, let us save him from being committed to the Reform School by providing him with a Big Brother. In a similar way, for the hundreds of lads throughout our country who lack proper parental guidance, a friend, called a Big Brother, can very profitably be assigned. Such work under our aegis will prove of incalculable benefit to the future development of Judaism in America. To this great work of volunteer service the B'nai B'rith concentrates its activities.

THE ACTIVITIES OF WORCESTER LODGE NO. 600 OF WORCESTER, MASS.---Visit of Dr. Coffee

On Purim evening, Wednesday, March 7, the members and friends of Worcester Lodge No. 600 were invited to an open meeting in the Congregation Temple of Israel, at which Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, National Director of the Social Service Department of Chicago, was the chief speaker. Mr. Archibald M. Hillman, member of the General Committee of District No 1, called the meeting to order. He was pleased to inform the members that, after many months of waiting, they were to be privileged to hear and meet the Social Service Director. Mr. David Goldstein then spoke of the new spirit which was animating so many activities of the Order. He was very happy to introduce the guest of the evening, Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee. In delivering an address on Purim night, Dr. Coffee said his thoughts must naturally turn to the Bible story where the fine heroism of Mordecai and Esther overcame Haman, the arch enemy of Israel. Unfortunately, Haman lives today. We Jews, just as in Bible days, suffer for the acts of the individual Jew. Because Haman hated Mordecai, therefore all Jews must perish. The best antidote for this cruel reasoning is to set a high and ideal standard of living. We must breathe into our life distinctly Jewish ideas. An illustration was taken from the Hebrew Free Loan Society. These organizations are found in every city of America where Jews live in number. The Bible encourages us to loan money without interest, but this is impossible under the present economic system of business. What should the Jew do? Let him become a member of the Hebrew Free Loan Society in his own community. Through these fine societies over a million dollars was loaned last year without interest. Hundreds and thousands of worthy people were put upon their feet and are now self-supporting who otherwise would have been compelled to ask for charity. Thus does the Jew combat poverty. Instead of accepting poverty as inescapable, we insist that it can be, and in fact it should be, wiped out and abolished. Purim is the occasion for remembering the poor. Let us think of them, not only with gifts, but aid them in a constructive way through Social Service to become self-supporting and stand upon their feet. This is the aim of the B'nai B'rith.

On the following day, March 8, 1917, Dr. Coffee was invited to address the students of the Classical High School, the oldest and largest high school in the city, which a large number of Jewish students attend. He spoke on the subject of personality and character and made a deep impression both on the students and teachers.

On Thursday evening, March 8, 1917, Worcester Lodge No. 600 gave a cabaret and dance for the benefit of the Hebrew Free School. This event took place in Mechanics Hall, the largest hall in Worcester. There were about 1,500 Jewish people present, with the result that about a thousand dollars was realized, to be used by the Hebrew Free School. On this occasion Dr. Coffee made an inspiring address upon the subject of "B'nai B'rithism" and congratulated the community on its splendid Hebrew schools which were started by and were receiving the encouragement of members of the Order.

Testimonial Banquet of Jacob Asher.

On Tuesday, March 13, 1917, Worcester Lodge tendered a banquet in honor of Jacob Asher, who was recently appointed associate judge of the District Court of Worcester. Mr. Asher is a very ardent Ben B'rith, having been for several years president of the B'nai B'rith degree team. There were about 60 members present. Mr. David Goldstein, president of the lodge, acted as toastmaster. Speakers were Mayor Pehr G. Holmes, Judge A. K. Cohen, past president of District Grand Lodge No. 1; Rabbi Herbert G. Goldstein, head of the Peoples Institute of New York, who made a special trip to Worcester in honor of the occasion; Henry Lasker of Springfield, Richard Herman of Boston, Archibald M. Hillman, past president of Worcester Lodge, and Hon. Jacob Asher. In his address Mayor Holmes said:

"In our wars the Hebrew has borne arms. In the great civil war there were, it is stated, at least 30,000 Hebrews fighting under the stars and stripes for the preservation of the Union. In many branches of activity, ranging from art and literature to industry, we may find the Hebrew active and contributing to progress.

"Together with many people of other tongues who have come to this country to take up the work of citizenship, they have contributed much to the growth of the country. This is a country of many peoples, yet a country of but one people, Americans.

"Let there be a free mingling always of these people in the interests of true democracy. All are animated by one desire, the fair and square deal for all men, and in carrying out this desire they meet on common ground as Americans. Get together; meet on common grounds. If a man is a real man let that be sufficient and welcome him. That's the doctrine which built this country up, and that's the doctrine that will keep it going".

CLARKSBURG WEST VIRGINIA.

The Jewish community of Clarksburg held an open meeting on Tuesday, March 20, to hear an address by Rev. Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director. The meeting was held in the Masonic Temple and under the auspices of Clarksburg Lodge No. 727. Practically every Jewish person in the city was in attendance and many non-Jewish friends as well. Mr. Aaron Winer acted as chairman of the evening and announced the subject of Dr. Coffee as "Big Brother Work." In summary, he said that the chief stress which the social service department is now laying, rests upon the Big Brother Movement. This idea is barely a dozen years old and aims to help boys, who otherwise would fall into evil ways and land in the Reform School. The B'nai B'rith aims to look after Jewish boys and encourages the creation of a social service committee in every city in the land where we have a lodge. Through this committee the Big Brother work shall be successfully carried on. Splendid results have already been achieved and there is every reason to believe that fewer Jewish boys henceforth will be committed to Reform Schools throughout the country. The average Jewish boy needs help, friendship and guidance. He is by no means bad. He lacks encouragement and good companionship. In a similar way we are interested in the released prisoner. He also needs a Big Brother to find him a position and extend the hand of welcome. Here is a very constructive way of lessening prejudice in America. Let us look after the weak and the helpless among our own and direct aright the activities of those who otherwise might turn from the path of virtue.

At the conclusion of the address Mr. Joseph Jay proposed a vote of thanks to the speaker and this was unanimously carried.

PARKERSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA.

A special open meeting of Parkersburg Lodge No. 767 was called for Monday, March 19, to listen to the message which was brought by the Social Director, Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, of Chicago, Ill. Never before did the Jewish people come together in such goodly number. The speaker of the evening was introduced by Mr. Joseph Stern, and his subject was "Social Service in Smaller Communities". In many respects, the Jewish residents of smaller inland cities lack many of the advantages which their coreligionists in the metropolitan cities enjoy. The theater, Synagogues and Yiddish papers are not so readily obtained in the small cities. Nevertheless, there are many compensations. The children enjoy better schooling as well as opportunities for recreation and individual treatment which are denied in the large centers of population. To encourage Jewish folk to settle in cities of small size is a distinct obligation. However, people object to leaving the larger circle of friends unless they are sure that their children will be properly looked after. While the older folks may differ about religious customs, all must agree upon educating the children. Where there is no religious school, the B'nai B'rith is most eager to encourage the founding of one. Without a knowledge of Judaism we cannot expect our children to remain loyal to the faith. The B'nai B'rith believes in encouraging Synagogue attendance, in strengthening the religious school and in assisting every activity along Jewish lines. Social service in the smaller community means to extend the hand of friendship so that the community may exist as one large family.

While the local lodge includes nearly every Jew in the town, such a visit awakens renewed interest and this visit of Dr. Coffee's surely did this much.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, National Director of the Social Service Department, was the guest of Springfield Lodge, No. 684, on Monday. March 5th. While in this city he addressed the pupils of the Commercial High School and also the faculty and student body of the International Y. M. C. A. College A special meeting of the Lodge had been called for Monday night, which was very largely attended by the members of the Jewish community Mr. Henry Lasker, member of the Executive Committee of District No. 1, called the meeting to order and explained that this meeting was called to hear the new work Doctor Coffee is introducing in all parts of the country. After a musical selection had been rendered by Mrs. Wm. Radding, Mr. Henry Cohen, President of Springfield Lodge, in a few well chosen words told of the general activity which the Lodge had been carrying on. He then presented the speaker, to explain the ideals on which the Department is founded. Doctor Coffee based his remarks very largely on the fact that Springfield is to be the New England headquarters for the new bank, soon to be started under the auspices of the Rural Credit Bill. What is this bill? It traces back to the pioneer efforts of immigrant Jews who, dissatisfied with conditions in the sweat shops. undertook farming in New England. Thanks to easy financial terms granted them by New York bankers who were co-religionists, these men became successful farmers where Yankees had left the soil. When the United States Government investigated this fact and discovered that the success of this movement was based on the splendid financial arrangement of New York bankers, a bill embodying these arrangements was passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by President Wilson. It has been claimed that this is the most constructive piece of farm legislation in 50 years. We Jews may take great credit for having contributed this measure to American life. Therein is the secret of Judaism in America. We must improve and bless this country. Our Social Service Department has this very aim in mind. We shall look after Jewish boys and thus prevent them from entering reform schools. We shall accept prisoners upon their release and start them on the road of right living.

A meeting of the Social Service Committee was held with Doctor Coffee and [illegible] Samuel Price, [illegible] peration of his committee toward furthering these activities.

UNITY LODGE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The officers of Unity Lodge are manifesting much interest in the work of the lodge and Order. A number of them are men of high standing, such as the president, Bro. Hart, who is the Assistant Attorney of the City of San Francisco. Rev. Dr. Martin Meyer, who, notwithstanding the demands from all, finds time to be a regular attendant at the meetings of the lodge, and his able addresses cheer and instruct the members.

Recently the lodge had the pleasure of meeting Rev. Lissauer of Beth Israel Congregation, whose address at the meeting was well received.

The annual ball given on March 31 under the auspices of the lodge was a successful event.

The Social Service feature of the Order is receiving careful attention from the lodge, and one of its active workers is Bro. David Cohen. He has been particularly active in the matter of caring for delinquent boys. He has taken a fatherly interest in them, secured for them employment, and has in general become a blessing to these boys.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

A membership campaign was launched successfully at an enthusiastic meeting held under the auspices of Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., on Feb. 2[illegible], 1917. Two teams of ten men each, one designated the "Red Team", under the captaincy of A. Schne, and the "Blue Team", captained by Max Frank, are doing good work in enlisting eligible men of the city for B'nai B'rith work. To stimulate the teams, prizes have been offered to the winner.

Mr. Herman Bernstein, the editor of "The Day", will address the lodge in the near future on "The Russia of Today". Other speakers scheduled for the meetings of the lodge are: Naval Commander Moritz, who will lecture on "The Navy", and Mr. Maurice B. Samuels, who will [illegible] 'Experience". A prize has been [illegible] Bro Charles H. Shapiro, a [illegible] member of the lodge, for the [illegible] written by a child of a member of the lodge on the topic, "What the [illegible] Has Done for Bridgeport".

HOLYOKE, MASS.

During his tour of New England Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, paid a visit to Holyoke on Tuesday, March 6th, and was the guest of Holyoke Lodge No. 728. The meeting not only drew the members of the Jewish community, but many influential Christians were likewise present to hear the words of the visitor. Mr. M. M. Bernstein, President of the Lodge, called the meeting to order and introduced as chairman of the evening, Rabbi Israel Lebendiger. He called upon Mr. Wm. Dunn, Editor of the Holyoke Union, who briefly responded by telling how much our country is indebted to its Jewish immigrants. Doctor Coffee chose as his theme "Judaism in Smaller Communities". He felt that it was a duty of the smaller cities in America to encourage the settling of immigrants there. Of the 18 boys recently found at the Reform School in Illinois, 17 were from homes in the crowded West Side of Chicago. The great and agricultural communities of the State, with many cities of middle size, only contributed one Jewish lad. It is quite possible in a city of the size of Holyoke, to keep careful watch over all the Jewish boys, and he commended the fine work which had already begun, of taking a survey of the Jewish community. It is not enough to be a successful merchant, a Jew must also be a fine type of the best American citizen. In the smaller communities, due largely to ignorant Christian preachers, the Jew is completely misunderstood. He is still accused of having killed the Nazarene. Though this incident took place eighteen centuries ago, we of to-day are still paying the penalty. The type of Jew who blesses America is witnessed in the life of Jacob H. Schiff. Two months ago, when celebrating his 70th birthday, he gave three-quarters of a million dollars in public donations to Jewish and non-Jewish organizations, mostly along Social Service lines. Such a man enriches all America and by his very life fights down narrow prejudice. The B'nai B'rith calls upon its Holyoke members to assist all newcomers to become self-supporting and to lend a helping hand to their children.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATION BY PROGRESS LODGE, PEORIA, ILL.

B'nai B'rith Day was observed by Progress Lodge No. 113 of Peoria, Ill., on March 7, 1917, with a banquet at the Jefferson Hotel, which was limited strictly to members, applicants for membership and their families. Bros. Edward Sonnenschein, first vice-president, and Julius H. Meyer, past president of the District Grand Lodge, were present as representatives of the Grand Lodge and addressed the gathering.

During the day Bro. Meyer addressed the Optimists' Club at noon. This club consists of 100 members, limited to one from each profession or business, and is a very representative body. Mr. Meyer spoke on "Every Day Religion", of "The Religious Ideals to Be Pursued By Business Man", and his address was very well received. In view of the fact that the audience consisted of representative Peoria men, ninety per cent of whom were non-Jews, the same could not but have a very solitary influence.

In the afternoon a conference of members of Progress Lodge and other lodges in surrounding cities was held. Short talks on the work of the Order and how to increase the efficiency of the lodges were made by Bros. Meyer, Sonnenschein, Sam Levin of Danville, I. J. Levinson and Rabbi Bottigheimer of Peoria.

In the evening a banquet was given at the Jefferson Hotel, which proved a very fine affair. The president of the lodge, Bro. Seymour Woolner, presided. The principal addresses were madé by Bros. Sonnenschein and Meyer, who reviewed the activities of the Order, especially emphasizing the work of the Anti-Defamation League and Social Service.

EZEKIEL LODGE, NEWARK, N. J.

J., was held on March 28, 1917, the same being a combination get-together affair, following the fiftieth anniversary banquet of the lodge, a house warming of the new meeting place, situated in the beautiful assembly hall of Temple B'nai Jeshuron, and a complimentary dance and reception tendered by the ladies' auxiliary.

A class of 19 candidates were initiated by the degree team of the lodge. Addresses on the work of the Order were delivered by Past President Bro. Dr. B. S. Pollock and by Rabbi Solomon Foster.

The membership committee, under the leadership of Bros. L. C. Schwartz and Morris Hergst, is actively engaged in securing another class of candidates to be initiated at the second meeting in April.

CHATTANOOGA LODGE OF CHATTANOOGA, TENN., PREPARES FOR ANNUAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE, NO. 7.

ALBANY, N. Y.

On Sunday evening, March 4th, a special meeting, open to the public, of Gideon Lodge, No. 140, was held in the vestry rooms of the Temple to listen to an address by Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, National Director of the Social Service Department. The musical part of the program consisted of songs by Miss Grace Klugman Schwartz and a violin solo by Mr. Nathan Brenner. Mr. Robert H. Poskanzer, President of the Lodge, called the meeting to order. He expressed his gratification that despite the inclement weather, so many friends should brave the elements to hear of the new work being done by the B'nai B'rith. Doctor Coffee chose for his theme "Present Day Problems". He reminded his audience that President Wilson had just taken the oath of office for another four years. Within this period great and momentous matters will press for solution. In what way can the B'nai B'rith best assist our country and also Judaism in America? We must first of all fight that prejudice against our people which arises from without, through ignorance. We must also do all within our power to encourage our brethren to live clean and upright lives. Our best service to America is through strengthening Social Service activities. Getting rich will not save us, nor will assimilation protect us. The positive stand for the high ideals, which our Prophets taught, and breathing them into American life, is our best protection for the future. At the conclusion of the address Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Goldenson proposed a vote of thanks to the speaker, which was unanimously carried. Albany Lodge will undertake local Social Service work at the earliest possible date.

VICTORIA, B. C.

Victoria Lodge No. 758, of Victoria, B. C., appointed a delegation to petition Dr. J. D. McLean, the minister of education, to have the play, "The Merchant of Venice" eliminated from the educational institutions of the province. The committee consisted of Jacob Dobrin, Joseph Rose and Mrs. Isidor Lancaster. Dr. McLean promised to present the petition to the ministers of British Columbia.

INSTITUTION OF OTTUMWA LODGE, NO. 808, OF OTTUMWA, IA.

On March 19, 1917, the B'nai B'rith Lodge, to be known as "Ottumwa Lodge No. 808," was instituted in the city of Ottumwa, Iowa.

The meeting was called to order by Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer, of Des Moines, Iowa, a member of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge, who was the representative of the Grand Lodge and who appointed various officers to aid him in the work of instituting the lodge. Twenty-six members responded to the roll call and they were duly initiated by the presiding officer, assisted by Brothers Rabbi H. Cohen, D. Oransky, M. Silberman and L. Adelman, all members of Des Moines Lodge No. 330, of Des Moines, Iowa.

Thereupon the Lodge proceeded with the nomination and election of officers for the ensuing term, and the following were elected:

President, Clinton Adler; Vice-President, Chas. Redman; Treasurer, D. Spiwak; Secretary, Ben Sigel; Guardian, Mose Spiwak, and as Monitor, Brother S. Redman was elected and duly appointed by the installing officers. As Trustees Brothers E. Labovitz, J. Redman and L. Sax were elected. Brother Mannheimer thereupon installed the officers.

Nine applications for membership were thereupon presented and were ordered referred to two special investigating committees. The regular order of business being concluded, the Lodge was closed in due form and the members adjourned for a social hour at the home of Mr. Adler, in honor of the representatives of the Grand Lodge and their visiting brothers. Light refreshments were served and a number of short addresses on the work of the Order were made.

B'NAI B'RITH OF DENVER.

At the meeting of Denver Lodge No. 171 of Denver, Colo., held on Feb. 4 at the Brown Palace Hotel, a class initiation and smoker took place. The Intellectual Advancement Committee of the lodge has arranged for a series of talks on noted Jews of America. At this meeting the first of the series was given by Bro. Samuel S. Ginsberg on "Hon. Simon Wolf", past president of the Order. At the close of the regular order of business the smoker was held, during which strictly kosher refreshments were served. The meeting was attended by more than 200 members and 67 candidates were initiated. Instead of the usual speeches, a program of vaudeville and music was rendered, which was thoroughly enjoyed.

From the annual report of the secretary, it appears that the building fund of Denver Lodge has grown to $14,000. It is hoped that before another year elapses the lodge will feel justified in starting building operations to secure a permanent home for itself.

At the meeting of the lodge held on March 11 in the regular lodge rooms, the second of the series of talks on noted Jews was given by Bro. Milton M. Schayer on "Mr. Jacob H. Schiff".

The lodge has arranged for a voluntary assessment on the part of its members to the propaganda fund for the purpose of advancing the interests of the lodge and to enable it to arrange entertainments and social evenings. The members are responding liberally to this appeal.

The membership of the lodge has passed the 700 mark.

The Social Service Big Brother Committee is doing effective work. Besides being engaged with the Juvenile Court and the Industrial School in Golden, much constructive Social Service work is being accomplished. Recently the Boys' Indoor and Outdoor Club was formed. The membership of this club is steadily growing and good results are being achieved.

JOINT SEDER BY NEW YORK LODGES.

The annual joint Metropolitan Seder was held this year under the auspices of Washington, Manhattan, Jordan and Edward Everett Lodges, Saturday evening, April 7, at the Savigny, Lenox Ave. and 122nd St., New York City. The Hagaddah used on the occasion was the one of Mrs. Philip Cowen, wife of Bro. Philip Cowen, secretary of Manhattan Lodge. District Secretary Bro. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan officiated and was assisted by Bro. Rev. Schlager, Cantor of Temple Emanuel. The committee of arrangements consisted of Bros. H. M. Ullman, Dr. M. M. Stark, Al. Baum and George M. Sachs. The Seder service was very impressive and well attended. The Seder was followed by a social reunion of the members and their families and a most delightful evening was spent.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF WAUSAU LODGE, WAUSAU, WIS.

Wausau Lodge No. 670 of Wausau, Wis., fittingly commemorated its organization in an annual celebration held at Castle Hall on March 3, 1917. The entire day was given over to the celebration and the various occasions were well attended.

Saturday afternoon was spent in securing new members for the organization, and in this work the presence of Bro. H. D. Frankel of St. Paul, second vice-president of the Grand Lodge, was of much value and benefit.

On Sunday morning a meeting of the lodge was held, at which a large class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge, under charge of Bro. Frankel.

In the afternoon a public meeting was held, at which a varied program of musical and vocal numbers was successfully carried out. The feature of the meeting was a lecture by Bro. Frankel on the subject, "A Knock at the Door". The general trend of the address was a resume of the work accomplished and what is still to be done by the Order.

The evening program was an enjoyable one and it consisted of an entertainment and musical numbers. Addresses were made by Mr. Meyer Shapiro, of Antigo, on the subject, "American Incrimination", and by Mr. H. D. Frankel on the subject, "To Them That Seek". Short talks were also made by Messrs. J. Wilke and G. Eckerle.

The closing part of the evening was devoted to dancing and a delightful supper was served. After supper a vaudeville performance was given.

The hall was elaborately decorated with flags and the attendance, which was large, included a large number of out-of-town guests. Some of the members of the lodge came from a dozen cities as far as 125 miles, to attend the celebration.

CHARLESTON, WEST VIRGINIA.

On Sunday afternoon, March 18, Charleston Lodge No. 788, held a special and open meeting in the Temple to hear the message which Rev. Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, brought. Despite the snow storm, a fine attendance was present. The meeting was opened by Rabbi Israel Bettan. He introduced Dr. Coffee, who spoke on "Justice, Not Charity." The theme of the speaker was that the Biblical conception of justice was fundamental to Jewish life. The idea of charity has largely been emphasized and developed through Christianity. Only in recent times has there been a reaction to the older and far more nobler concept. No man wants charity. We desire an opportunity to work. No self-respecting person is satisfied to live on alms. The true ideal is for every man to be economically independent. This can only be obtained through the rule of justice. The Social Service Department of the B'nai B'rith aims at this lofty ideal. We encourage our lodges to assist worthy coreligionists to be self-supporting. Through our committees we shall give them opportunity to develop. Much of the poverty and misery of our day can be overcome if people approach the rule of justice. Our Order has a fine body of enthusiastic American Jews. By inspiring these men to aim for the day of justice, we can accomplish great good.

At the conclusion of the address practically every person in the assembly was introduced to Dr. Coffee. The sole regret was that the brevity of his stay prevented him from getting in touch with local social activities.

MEMPHIS, TENN.

The Social Service Department of Memphis Lodge No. 35, of Memphis, Tenn. is doing a great altruistic work in promoting the Big Brother Movement in that city.

An interesting meeting of the Big Brother Society was held on Saturday evening, March 10, 1917, and the reports made showed rapid progress of the organization.

The work the Big Brothers are doing is proving so successful that it is satisfying a need long felt in Memphis. In cities all over the country this movement is gaining ground.

This department of the B'nai B'rith is undertaking to save the Jewish homeless boys to the community through the friendly advice of an older brother, or an adult friend, who volunteer their services to assist in every way by improving the home conditions of the boy, in supplying him with work, and in advising him as to the proper way of living, and in every way to improve his environments. In other cities the Big Sister movement has also been organized along the same plans, and it is contemplated to organize a Big Sister association at an early date.

MORGANTOWN, WEST VIRGINIA.

The visit of a Rabbi to Morgantown is always an occasion of unusual interest. When it was known that Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Social Service Director, was to be in this community on Wednesday, March 21, a public meeting was arranged for the afternoon in the First Baptist Church, on which occasion Doctor Coffee spoke on "The Field of Social Service." Professor A. M. Bristol, head of the Department of Sociology at the University of West Virginia, introduced the speaker. The same evening Doctor Coffee addressed an open meeting in Redmen's Hall under the auspices of Morgantown Lodge No. 766. The meeting was called to order by Mr. Max Dalinsky, who turned the gavel over to Samuel Hamil, and the latter, in a brief and appropriate speech introduced the speaker of the evening, Doctor Coffee. The subject was "Prejudice in America." In this country, one would imagine that with the spread of education, prejudice against the Jew would cease. Nevertheless, in the communities such as this where an institution of higher learning is to be found, prejudice has not been overcome. One of the objects of our Order is to fight this unworthy and unpatriotic narrow spirit of bigotry. Therefore, the B'nai B'rith is opposed to the teaching of the "Merchant of Venice" in the public schools, for unconsciously the immature mind gains a false impression of the Jew. The B'nai B'rith successfully prevented the production of a play which would have emphasized the century-old lie that the Jews killed Jesus. In a positive way we fight prejudice by encouraging social service activities which will strengthen and bless the children of this land. By keeping children within the narrow path of right, we are training our lads for future citizenship in America. The best refutation to ignoble prejudice may be found in the fine lives of our Jewish men and women. Let us encourage and aid our co-religionists to pure manhood and womanhood. In university communities there are earnest men and women who need help. The B'nai B'rith should make a survey and offer fellowship to all members of our faith.

MEMORIAL DAY OBSERVANCE BY MEMPHIS LODGE.

Memphis Lodge No. 35, commemorated its Annual Memorial Day on Sunday morning, March 11, 1917, in memory of its members who passed away during the past year.

President Julius Alperin presided. An unusually large attendance was present. Preceding the Memorial Service, a class of candidates was initiated and regular routine business was transacted.

Mr. Jos. M. Samfield delivered the Memorial address in an inspiring manner, concluding his remarks with a roll call of the deceased members of the Lodge, who had died during the past year. The Lodge thereupon arose, and Rabbi H. R. Gold recited the Kaddish.

Mr. H. J. Lewis read the Prize Essay written by Mr. Moses Schwartz, of Mobile, on the subject, "Why Every Jew Should be a Member of the Order." This was followed by an interesting discussion, participated in by a number of the members, on the subject, "Should the B'nai B'rith Remain a Secret Order?"

DR. SALING SIMON TO SUPERINTEND NATIONAL JEWISH HOSPITAL.

The Board of Managers of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives voted unanimously to engage Dr. S. Simon as superintendent. The recommendation of the appointment has been sent to the president of the hospital, Samuel Grabfelder, Atlantic City.

Dr. Simon, recognized expert on tuberculosis, has been in charge of the institution since Dr. M. Collins' resignation a month ago. Dr. Simon has been a practicing physician in Denver 20 years. He was graduated in 1889 from the City College of New York and from the Gross Medical College in Denver in 1895. He was chief physician at the County Hospital before entering into private practice.

Dr. Simon has been on the staffs of the County Hospital, Mercy and National Jewish Hospital for years and has studied extensively abroad, visiting Europe on several occasions to take post-graduate courses and do research work in hospitals of Berlin, Vienna, Paris, London and Hamburg.

With the approval of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge, Bro. Eugene Mannheimer, of Des Moines, Ia., paid a visit to Cedar Rapids, Ia., for the purpose of awakening the necessary interest in the formation of a lodge in that city should local conditions warrant it.

JOSEPH LODGE, SAVANNAH, GA.

At a well attended meeting of Joseph Lodge No. 76, of Savannah, Ga., held on Sunday, March 11, 1917, Bro. Morton Dick, read a paper on the "Jewish Home Life", wherein he plead for a return to the old ideals and laid stress on the fact that the awakening of the Jewish spirit was due to the lax method of teaching the principles of our faith in the home. Mr. Dick's paper was the second of a series arranged by the members of the lodge. This plan received its innovation at the preceding meeting and met with much enthusiastic approval.

At a recent meeting of the Jewish Educational Alliance, Bro. Louis Pinkussohn, a prominent member of the local bar, speaking on the important part Alliance was taking in Jewish affairs, and praised the members of the Order for their active moral and financial support.

Visit of the President of the Order.

On Thursday, March 15, 1917, the City of Savannah, and particularly its B'nai B'rith contingent, received in its midst a distinguished guest in the person of Bro. Adolf Kraus, president of the Order. Although acting against the orders of his physicians, but anxious to comply with the requests of Savannah's Jewry, President Kraus addressed an overwhelmingly filled meeting, held at the auditorium of the Alliance Building.

Dr. George Solomon, rabbi of the community and secretary of the Grand Lodge, introduced the speaker. Mr. Kraus, in his address, outlined the work of the Order, its efforts and accomplishments and its plans for the future. It was the unanimous opinion of all those who were fortunate enough to listen to the speaker that this message was most opportune and thoroughly imbued with the true B'nai B'rith and Jewish spirit.

At the close of the evening an informal dinner was arranged by the officers of the lodge in honor of their distinguished guest.

STEUBENVILLE, OHIO.

A large and enthusiastic meeting of Steubenville Lodge No. 787 took place on Sunday, March 4, 1917. He delivered a forceful address to the members at the lodge meeting and again at an open meeting at the Olympic Theater in the evening. Both were most eloquent efforts and were listened to with great interest. A number of out-of-town prominent B'nai B'rith members were in attendance at both meetings.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATION BY CHIPPEWA VALLEY LODGE No. 334, EAU CLAIRE, WIS.

The annual B'nai B'rith Day celebration of Chippewa Valley Lodge No. 334 of Eau Claire, was held on Sunday, March 11, 1917, and took the form of a Purim Ball, the proceeds of which were to be devoted for the benefit of the European war sufferers. The event was marked by a specially good attendance. At the meeting of the lodge in the afternoon, during which a class of candidates were initiated, Bro. Gustavus Loevinger of St. Paul, chairman of the Propaganda Committee of the district, was the guest of honor, and he addressed the lodge on "The Duties We Owe the Order". In the evening an open meeting was held which was attended by the largest and most enthusiastic concourse of members and their friends from Eau Claire and the surrounding cities. The address of the evening was delivered by Bro. Loevinger on the subject, "The Man Without a Shadow". His address was followed by a real Purim Ball, which lasted until the early hours in the morning, during which refreshments were served. The entire proceeds of the dance, exceeding $100, was appropriated for the benefit of the war sufferers.

Thursday, March 8, 1917, was the occasion of one of the most enjoyable events partaken of by the members and friends of Dacotah Lodge of Grand Forks, N. Dak. The scene was the new B'nai B'rith club rooms recently provided for by a public spirited group of prominent members of the Lodge. The occasion was doubly marked; in that it commemorated the fourth anniversary of the founding of the Lodge and by the fact that it was Purim night.

The party began in the nature of a dance in which the members of the Lodge acted as hosts of their friends in the city and out of town. At 10:30 P.M. the floor was cleared of all the modern infringements in the terpsichorean art and for the next thirty minutes a genuine eighteenth century minuet held sway over the dancers under the direction of Bro. Leo Baer. When colonial pastimes gave way to modern innovations, dancing was resumed until midnight, at which time a committee of ladies headed by Mrs. L. Rosoff, served a very appetizing lunch, arranged after the Purim fashion.

Following the midnight lunch the chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee appeared on the scene and demanded the floor. Bro. Max Rabinovitch acting in his capacity as chairman, announced that his committee had been in secret caucus until this late midnight hour, and had reached a decision not to permit anyone to depart until his committee had been given a hearing on this memorable occasion. President Bro. Sam Friedman gave the committee unanimous consent to proceed. Bro. Rabinovitch then took charge and briefly pointed to the work which the Order was carrying on throughout the world. Bro. Sig Wolff also responded with an address upon the value of the Order to every Jew. He was followed by Bro. Geo. Papermaster, who called attention to the Social Service work of the Order and its relation to the future of American Judaism. "The Social Service Worker", he said, "is always ready to lay aside his own individual ideas for the sake of securing a closer union between the immigrant father and his native child. The means used, however must not destroy the end in view, namely a tolerant and united Israel".

DISTRICT No. 5.

Arrangements have been made by the Secretary of District Grand Lodge, Bro. George Solomon of Savannah, Ga., whereby a campaign for the establishment of a lodge in the City of Tampa Fla., will soon be undertaken.

On Sunday evening, March 11, 1917, Bro. Dr. George Solomon of Savannah, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 5, organized and officially installed Zelnicker Lodge No. 807 at Tampa, Fla., with Mr. Henry Cohen as president and Robert Gordon as secretary.

On Wednesday evening, March 4, Dr. Solomon paid an official visit to Jacksonville, Fla., and after addressing an enthusiastic gathering, aided in the initiation of a class of eleven candidates Jacksonville Lodge is prospering and bids fair to become one of the leading lodges of the district.

On Thursday evening, March 14, Mr. Adolf Kraus, president of the Order, visited Savannah, Ga., and addressed the Jewish community of that city at a largely attended meeting held in the Educational Alliance Building. Dr. Solomon presided and introduced the speaker.

Under the auspices of Jacksonville Lodge No. 800, of Jacksonville, Fla., Rev. Dr. Madison C. Peters delivered a lecture at the Temple on Thursday, March 1, 1917, on the subject, "Why the Prejudice Against the Jew and How to Remove It"? DISTRICT No. 6.

Menorah Lodge No. 769, of Stevens Point, Wis., is making arrangements for a membership campaign with a view of securing the affiliation of all the coreligionists resident in Stevens Point, as well as in surrounding communities.

The attention of Julius Houseman Lodge No. 238 of Grand Rapids, Mich., was called by President Collat to the necessity of a social center to be created on a more comprehensive plan than the usual settlement house. The proposition is to create a community center, a central location for all communal activities, except religious services. The lodge appointed a committee to carefully consider the subject matter and submit a report as to the desirability and advisability to consummate such a plan.

As a result of the efforts of Bro. Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer, of Des Moines, Ia., a B'nai B'rith lodge has been organized at Cedar Rapids, Ia., and its application for a charter has been favorably acted upon by the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge. It is expected that the new lodge will be instituted during the month of April.

At the conference of the Central Illinois lodges held in Springfield on April 1, 1917, which was well attended, Bro. Dr. H. J. Davis, President of the District, addressed the gathering on the "Utility of B'nai B'rith Councils". As a result thereof it was unanimously voted to organize a council to represent all the Central Illinois lodges.

DISTRICT No. 7.

As a result of the efforts of Mr. Louis Cohen of Fort Smith, Ark., member of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 7, a new lodge has been organized at McAlester, Okla., and was instituted on Sunday, March 25, 1917. The lodge begins with a charter membership of 25 members.

The lodges of District No. 7 have been requested, through an official circular issued by Rabbi George Fox, chairman of the Cultural Advancement Committee, to observe March 11 as Memorial Day. The committee furnished the lodges also with a program, which includes the reading of the prize essay and of the president's memorial address, as prepared by the president of the district, Bro. Ernest R. Bernstein, to be followed by the recitation of Kadish after the names of the deceased members of the lodge had been read.

The capacity of the synagogue of Morgan City, La., was taxed on Sunday evening, March 11, when Dr. Mendel Silber of New Orleans delivered an address on "Judaism and Life with Special Reference to B'nai B'rith". Mr. Sol Klotz of Napoleonville, a member of the General Committee of the Grand Lodge and a devoted worker in the ranks of the Order, was present and as a result of his propaganda work among the poor coreligionists, a great deal of enthusiasm has been aroused which will result in the establishment of a lodge in that community.

At the regular meeting of Isidor Straus Lodge No. 519, of Fort Worth, Tex., held on Feb. 20, 1917, delegates to the coming convention of the District Grand Lodge to be held in Chattanooga, Tenn., on April 22, 1917, were elected.

The lodge observed Memorial Day with an open session at the Hebrew Institute on March 11 to which the public was invited.

B'nai B'rith Day was observed by Little Rock Lodge No. 158, of Little Rock, Ark., on Feb. 27, 1917. Rabbi Dr. Jos. Stolz of Chicago delivered the principal address at the Temple, where a large audience assembled to hear the speaker who, many years ago, was the Rabbi of the community.

B'NAI B'RITH CELEBRATION AT HELENA, ARK.

On Sunday, Feb. 18, the annual B'nai B'rith Day celebration of Aaron Meyers Lodge No. 159 was held at the Temple. Rabbi L. Rothstein of Alexandria, La., was the orator of the occasion and he delivered a wonderful and interesting talk on "Why I Am a Ben B'rith". Our young member, Dave Meyers, made a very fine talk on "What the B'nai B'rith Means to the Young Man". Very interesting remarks on what our Order has in store for us by our Rabbi Pizer Jacobs was well received. The musical program was in charge of Mrs. I. N. Metz. After the program, refreshments were served in the lodge rooms adjoining the Temple.

ing outside. One was asked why he had not gone to hear the sermon. He replied: "I was there once before and heard him preach. All I understood was 'Jacob'. I don't know whether he meant Yokev, who lives in the 'Gaertel' (the slum district of the ghetto) or any other Yokev. When I go to Reb Moshe Loeb's sermon then I know at least what he is talking". This single incident shows the difficulty which a man of Feuchtwang's type had to face and which kept him a stranger in the congregation to which he ministered for almost 27 years from his election in 1861 until his death Jan. 19, 1888.

JEWISH LEADERS

A Series of Historical Portraits

8. EZRA, THE LEADER, AS PRIESTLY SCRIBE AND REFORMER.

Israel bears the proud distinction of being "the People of the Book", the nation that gave to the world its noblest literary treasure. As the People of the Book, its ranks were filled with bookmakers. Nevertheless, of Israel, too, we may speak the words of Carlyle, that perhaps once in two centuries there comes a man capable of writing a book. The rest are mere scribblers, whose scratchings on the sand, the winds of time obliterate. But when a true man of letters does appear, he erects monuments for all succeeding ages. What he builds outlasts the hills of granite.

Such builders were Israel's prophets The strivings, hopes and dreams of these men of genius, as embodied in the Book of Books, the Hebrew Bible, are destined to outlast the ages. The voices of these interpreters of God to man still ring out of the Bible's pages, calling to duty and to spiritual heights. The Bible, in its greater part, is the imperishable monument to their immortal spirits. However, this monument was not erected withou the co-operation of other classes of men. Authors, great as they may be, are no the final arbiters of their writings. They stand in need of copyists, editors and publishers to transmit their winged thoughts to the public. The prophets, too, might have been lost to us, had it not been for the scribes who preserved the literary treasures of Israel for mankind.

As among other nations in antiquity, so in Israel, the art of writing was cultivated primarily by the priests. They compiled the sacred histories, the laws, and the oracular utterances. They also committed to writing the songs of the rhapsodes who celebrated the mighty deeds of the fathers of the nation. From time immemorial, the priests wielded the pen of the scribe, to preserve the words of truth, and to evoke the religious feeling in the hearts of the people. In the period following the Babylonian Exile, the Scribe rose to a position of dominance in the religious life of the Jews.

A deep veil of obscurity rests upon the whole two centuries known as the Persian period of Jewish History (539-333 B. C. E.). The chief sources of our information, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, are so fragmentary and so bristling with difficulties, that any confident reconstruction of the leading events of that all-important age, which holds the key to the Bible, is impossible. Listening intently to the distant echoes of those days, we can still discern the struggles of the great men of God, for the rebuilding of the Jewish nation amid its ruins, and their strivings for a clearer expression of religious truth in the life of the people.

The hopes of the Jewish patriots that the proud city of Babylon would be destroyed, as an act of divine vengeance for the sufferings it inflicted upon their people, were fulfilled only in part. In the year 539, Cyrus, the new lord of Asia, conquered Babylon. As he was welcomed by the priests and nobles, he left Babylon unharmed. Contrary to the anticipations of Deutero-Isaiah, Cyrus, far from demolishing Bel and the other idols of Babylonia, openly declared himself the worshipper of Bel-Marduk. In a cylinder inscription we read these words of Cyrus: "Marduk the great Lord [granted] me favor among the Babylonians, and I gave daily care for his worship. . . . We, in his presence and with sincerity, gladly lauded his exalted [divinity]". This conciliatory policy of Cyrus meant the salvation of Israel. The Assyrian and Babylonian monarchs used to transplant their conquered nations into strange lands, and keep them there as prisoners of war. Cyrus reversed their policy and allowed all such people to return to their homelands. He writes: "I collected all their people (referring to the religions on the other side of the Tigris) and restored [them] to their dwelling places; and the gods of Sumer and Akkad whom Nebonides, to the anger of the lord of the gods, had brought into Babylon, by the command of Marduk, the great lord peacefully in their own shrines I made them dwell, in habitations giving joy to their hearts". (See Cylinder of Cyrus, in Harper's Assyrian and Babylonian Literature, pp. 171-174.)

In keeping with his general political policy, Cyrus issued a decree that "whosoever there is among you of all His (Yahweh's) people—his God be with him—let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of Yahweh, the God of Israel. He is the God who is in Jerusalem" (Ezra 1: 3). Cyrus did not build Jerusalem and its Temple, as the impassioned prophet had predicted. He merely gave the Jews permission to rebuild their sanctuary; and also returned to them the sacred vessels of the Temple, which Nebuchadnezzar had plundered. They were turned over to Sheshbazzar (in Chronicles III: 18, he is called Shenazzar), the son of Jehoiachim, the unfortunate king of Judah, who, after a reign of three months, had been deported to Babylon, and kept in prison for thirty-seven years, until he was released by Evil-Merodach in the year 561. As the son of Jehoiachim, Sheshbazzar was naturally looked upon as the representative of the Jews. With rich gifts of silver and gold and cattle for the Temple, the band of exiles set out in the year 538 for the holy city of Jerusalem. The inspired prophet burst out in jubilant strains:

Go ye forth from Babylon,
Flee ye from the Chaldeans;
With a voice of singing,
Declare ye, tell this,
Utter it even to the end of the earth;
Say ye: "The Lord hath redeemed
His servant Jacob". (Isaiah 48: 20).

The exultation of the people was expressed in these joyful words of the one hundred twenty-sixth Psalm:

When the Lord brought back those that returned to Zion,
We were like unto them that dream.
Then was our mouth filled with laughter,
And our tongue with singing;
Then said they among the nations:
"The Lord hath done great things with these".
Yea, the Lord hath done great things with us;
Whereof we rejoice.

Alas, the dream, though sweet, was only a dream. Sheshbazzar came to Judah, and earnestly undertook the rebuilding of the Temple. (Ezra V: 16). But the building rose very slowly above the foundations. The peasantry of Judah, mercilessly plundered by the marauding neighbors, was too poor to materially assist in the work. The men that had come from Babylon were few in numbers, and rich only in enthusiasm and in love for their fatherland. But something more was needed. The impatient people were yet to learn the invaluable lesson that a nation cannot be reborn in a day.

Following the death of Cyrus, the vast Persian empire was thrown into the ceaseless turmoil of rebellion. Even after Darius I. usurped the throne, the political unsettlement continued. In several provinces attempts were made at the establishment of independent kingdoms. In his own account of these events, Darius states that he had to fight nineteen battles to maintain his authority in the Persian Empire. See Harper, Assyrian and Babylonian Literature, pp. 174-187). Possibly as "a bid for the loyalty of the Jewish community, which, in the troubled days of the Persian Empire, was not without its value", Zerubbabel, as Sheshbazzar before him, was entrusted by Darius with the governorship of Judah. Zerubbabel was the grandson of Jehoiachm. As a "sprout" of the royal stem of David, Zerubbabel must have been the object of many Messianic hopes. Associated with Zerubbabel was Joshua, son of Jehozadak, and grandson of Seraiah, the "chief-priest" of the Temple of Jerusalem, in the days of Zedekiah, the last king of Judah. With a large number of followers, they came from Babylon to Jerusalem, cherishing the highest hopes of a religious and political revival. The people of Judah had not yet outgrown their disappointment over the failure of the first attempt at rebuilding the sanctuary. And their material conditions had not improved. Hence, they pleaded that "the time to build the house of God had not yet arrived".

Zerubbabel and Joshua would not permith their enthusiasm to wane. In dauntless zeal, they restored the altar on its ancient site, and on Rosh Hashana of the year 520 B. C. E. they commenced to offer the morning and evening sacrifice (Ezra III:1-6). The celebration of the Succoth festival increased the joy of the people. Haggai and Zechariah sounded again the trumpet of prophecy, calling upon the people to honor God by rebuilding His Temple.

No sooner was the work started in earnest than the apple of discord was thrown into the camp of the builders. The mixed population of Samaria (composed of the descendants of the ten tribes, and of the foreign settlers that were introduced by the Assyrian conquerors) whose religious life was tinged with paganism (II. Kings XVII: 24ff), offered to help in the building. "Let us build with you", they petitioned the leaders, "for we seek your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto him since the days of Esarhaddon, King of Assyria, who brought us up hither". The prophets had spoken of the day when the Temple would become the house of prayer for all people. But the over-zealous leaders spurned the offering of love, of the half-breed Samaritans. Whatever may be said in extenuation for their action, Zerubbabel and Joshua invited the first sectarian split in Judaism. Curtly they replied: "Ye have nothing to do with us to build a house unto our God; but we ourselves together will build unto the Lord, the God of Israel, as King Cyrus, the king of Persia, hath commanded us". (Ezra IV: 1-3).

Henceforth, the Samaritans became estranged from the Jews, and tried all means to prevent them from building the Temple. However, despite their intrigues at the Persian Court, the second Temple was completed and dedicated in the year 516—about seventy years after the destruction of the first Temple, that was erected by King Solomon. The seventy years in which no regular Temple service was held are considered as the years of the Exile. With the rebuilding of the Temple, the glory of God had returned to Zion. Amid the shouts of joy, at the dedication services, the elders who remembered the grandeur of the First Temple wept aloud. To them, prophet Haggai addressed himself with this message: "Yet but a little while, and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of Hosts. The glory of the latter house shall be greater than that of the former, saith the Lord of Hosts; and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of Hosts". (Haggai II: 8-9).

The completion of the Temple inspired the people with new hopes for the restoration of the royal house of David. Haggai did not hesitate to predict the speedy downfall of the Persian Empire, and the subsequent re-establishment of Judah's independence. "The strength of the kingdoms of the nations" will be destroyed. "In that day, saith the Lord of Hosts, will I take thee, O Zerubbabel, My servant, . . . and will make thee as a signet; for I have chosen thee, saith the Lord of Hosts". (Haggai, II:20-23). Zechariah, too, expressed this hope, that Zerubbabel "shall sit and rule upon his throne; and there shall be a priest before his throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between both". (Zech. VI: 12-13). The political aspirations of the Jewish people furnished its enemies with ammunition for their intrigues at the royal court of Persia. The strong arm of Darius which crushed the rebellions of many of his subject nations, must have crushed the hopes of the Jews; for the curtain falls on Zerubbabel, and we hear no more of another scion of the house of David acting as governor of Judah. The Jewish enemies were successful in their intrigues, also during the reign of Xerxes (named Ahasuerus in the Bible. 484-464 B. C. E.) and during the first part of Artaxerxes' reign (464-424). Through their efforts, the Jews were prevented from rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, and of establishing thereby a proper defense for the city (Ezra IV: 6-23). The material condition of the Jews was steadily deteriorating. Their produce and their property were plundered. Their life itself was not safe. The governors of Judah were not over-scrupulous in their exactions from the people. In their religious life, too, the Jews were interfered with by their neighbors. The brilliant promises of a national revival, held out to them by Ezekiel and Deutero-Isaiah, were still unfulfilled. Through the heroic labors of Sheshbazzar and, later on, of Zerubbabel and Joshua, the high-priest, they had their Temple. But the spirit of life, of hope and of faith was still lacking in them. Together with their poverty and misery, came ignorance and apathy. The Hebrew tongue gradually began to give way to the Aramean dialect which was spoken by the neighboring tribes.

The disintegration of Judaism would have been certain, had not a second Moses arisen in the person of Ezra. With him, Judaism experienced a new Springtime. Later tradition rightly exalted his services, by stating that the Torah was lost and Ezra restored it. His biography, like that of most of our great men, is but scantily recorded. The book which bears his name describes him as "a ready scribe in the law of Moses". (Ezra VII: 6). It was during the Exile that the spirit of Judaism went through a refining process. The prophets were unusually active in preserving the faith of their fathers. The literary men were busy recording the eventful past of their people. And the priests, who were the depositories of the old law, zealously collected the Toroth or law-books. Their labors were embodied in the monumental history of Israel, in the five books of the Torah, and in the four volumes which go by the name of "First Prophets", dealing with the story of the rise and fall of the Jewish state. As a descendent of the leading priestly family of Zadock, and as "ready scribe", Ezra must have had a great share of the editorial work of Israel's sacred records. The Talmud credits him with establishing the text of the Pentateuch, by introducing a new orthography. He replaced the old Hebrew letters with Assyrian square characters, which have been in use in our Sefer Torahs and printed books to this day. (Senh. 21b). The nature of his real service to Jewish Literature cannot be determined, but neither can his services to Judaism be over-estimated. He imbued the dry bones of the house of Israel with the living spirit of divine law.

His biographical note states that "he had prepared his heart to search the law of the Lord, and to do it; also to teach in Israel, statutes and judgments" (Ezra VII: 10). "The law was to him an emanation of the Deity, revealed to Israel by Moses; he placed it higher, infinitely higher, than the writings of other prophets, for the first prophet and law-giver was the greatest of all. Convinced of the divine inspiration of the law of Moses, and flowing with zeal to make its authority paramount, he found no difficulty in infusing his own belief and his own zeal into the Judaeans of Babylonia and Persia. He soon acquired an honored position amongst them, his word gained authority, and he was more eagerly listened to than the prophets had been". (Prof. Graetz. His. of the Jews., pp. 365-6). To spread the knowledge of the Torah amongst his Judean brethren, he left for Jerusalem in the year 458 B. C. E., at the head of a large retinue of Jews, priests and Levites. King Artaxerxes Longimanus invested him with the power of appointing magistrates and judges over the Jews, and of enforcing the Jewish law by the penalties of death, banishment, confiscation of property, or imprisonment. (Ezra 25:26). With costly gifts from the royalty and the rich Jews of the Persian Empire, Ezra left Babylonia. He refused to ask for military escort, in fear that the king might say: Why does not the God of Israel protect you? and he arrived, with his people, at Jerusalem, after a five-month journey, without a single mishap.

Ezra's reputation as religious leader preceded him. No sooner had he offered the sacrifices at the Temple than the faithful representatives came to him with the complaint of the frequency of intermarriage with the heathen. The priests and the Levites, no less than the common people, were reported to be following the abominations of the old pagan nations and of the hostile tribes. "For they have taken of their daughters for themselves and for their sons; so that the holy seed have mingled themselves with the peoples of the lands; yea, the hand of the princes and the rulers hath been first in this faithlessness". (Ezra IX:2). In bitter grief, Ezra tore his garment, plucked the hair of his head and of his beard, and sat down mourning. The people "suffered desecration by mingling with foreign tribes, even though they had abjured idolatry. According to Ezra's reading of the Law, heathens who had accepted the law might enter into the community; they were however not to be put on a footing of equality with Israelites by birth, but were to live in a group apart. . . . The connection with them ought not to be of an intimate character; such was Ezra's opinion, based, not on ancestral pride, but on religious and social grounds. Some dim presentiment warned him that the reception of proselytes or half-proselytes into the community—of such elements as had not been tried and proved in the furnace of suffering, as the seed of Abraham had been—would give undue preponderance to the foreign element, and would de-[illegible] ll the moral and religious advan[illegible] which the Judeans had acquired". (Graetz. p. 367). Towards the evening sacrifice, he knelt in prayer, stirring the heart of the people to fear and repentance. At the order of the officers and the elders, under the threat of confiscation of property and of excommunication, all the people of Judah and Benjamin assembled in the ninth month (Kislev), at Jerusalem, in the street of the Temple, "trembling because of this matter, and for the great rain". In a dramatic manner, Ezra, the priest, rose and proclaimed to the people: "Ye have broken faith and have married foreign women to increase the guilt of Israel. Now, therefore, make confession unto the Lord God of your fathers, and do his pleasure; and separate yourselves from the peoples of the land and from the foreign women". (Ezra X:9-10.) Then the congregation suggested that, owing to the great number of people present and to the heavy rains, the rulers be empowered to deal with the matter thoroughly, adding that "this is not a work for one day or two, for we are many that transgressed in this matter". Ezra himself headed the committee that was in charge of putting an end to the intermarriage evil. In two months, they completed their investigation, and commenced to execute their plan.

With bleeding hearts, many Jews separated themselves from their wives and children. The barrier of separation between the Jews and the outside world was erected, a barrier which saved them from extinction, and also brought upon them the hate and the prejudice of their neighbors. As may be expected, the grief of the deserted wives and children aroused much bitterness towards the Jews in the hearts of those that were related to them. Outraged love usually turns into the most intense hate. Among the men that were repulsed from the [illegible] fellowship were several forceful [illegible]. By means fair or foul they were determined 'to maintain their right of worshipping at the Temple, and of sharing in the faith of Israel".

The endeavors of Ezra were reinforced thirteen years later by the appearance of Nehemiah, the favorite cup-bearer of King Artaxerxes (444 B. C. E.). Moved by the reports of misery that prevailed in Jerusalem, Nehemiah obtained royal [illegible] to rebuild the walls round the [illegible]. The spirit and manner in which he [illegible] his great task render him one of the noblest figures in our history. Cautiously he proceeded with the inspection of the city, and with the work of rebuilding its defenses. His workmen labored with a trowel in one hand and a sword in the other. From dawn to sunset, they were at work, while a part of them stood guard by day and by night. Thus, despite the attacks, the plots and intrigues of the enemies of the Jews, Nehemiah, with the help of the other self-sacrificing Jews, completed the heroic task of rebuilding Jerusalem's walls.

Immediately after the fortification of the holy city, Nehemiah devoted himself to the removal of all the abuses of the land, and to the reconsecration of the Jews to their God. On Rosh Hashana of the year 444 B. C. E., a large public assembly was held, at which Ezra, the priestly scribe, read and interpreted the "book of the law of Moses". (Nehemiah VIII). This was probably the first appearance of the Torah in its completed form, in Israel. The Torah (divided into five parts: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy) contains a history of the beginning of the Jewish people. After a short account of the origin of the world and of the human race—as the ancients understood it—the historian passes over to the narrative of the lives of the Patriarchs: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. The major part of the Torah (four books out of the five) is devoted to the life and laws of Moses. The authors everywhere speak of Moses in the third person. But, because the laws which were believed to have originated with Moses are imbedded in that record, the whole work came to be spoken of as the production of Moses. The laws themselves, with the exception of the Ten Commandments, while imbued with the spirit of Moses, the founder of Israel's religion, can hardly be considered as the work of Moses. They were called to life in the course of centuries of national existence. The earliest of them are embodied in the Code of the Covenant, and are attached to the Ten Commandments (Exodus XX-XXIII). In this collection of laws, we find relics of ancient Semitic practice, ethicized and Judaized, i. e., adapted to the needs of Israel in Canaan. Of a higher ethical and religious tone are the Deuteronomic Code (Deuteronomy) and the Code of Holiness (Leviticus XVII-XXVI). These laws regulate the civil and ceremonial life of the people. Throughout, it is their object to set Israel apart as a "peculiar nation", as a model people. They are pervaded by the prophetic spirit with its insistence on "Justice, justice, shalt thou pursue" and on "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself". The voice of the great prophets was now silenced, but their message, turned into law, began to mould the life of the people. The work of the Prophets was now completed by Ezra, who, through the written law, inaugurated a reformation of the most far-reaching consequences in the life of Judaism. The effect, on the people, of that reading of the Torah, cannot be described. Tears mingled with smiles; deep repentance with joy. On the twenty-fourth day of Tishri, another assembly was held, which has gone down in history as the "Kenesseth hagedola", the Great Assembly, because it marked a turning point in the history of the Jewish people. Taking the Torah as the foundation of their civic and religious life, the people assembled. solemnly pledged themselves to keep its teachings, to observe the Sabbath, support the Temple and its servants, and above all to refrain from intermarriages with the heathen nations. (Nehemiah VIII-X). In the twelve years or more of Nehemiah's governorship of Judea, the religious and economic life of the people was greatly advanced. Through his efforts the reformation of Ezra was made lasting.

Some people regarded Ezra's policy as extremely harsh. In protest against his demand that all Jews were to send away their non-Jewish wives, and particularly against his placing the Moabites under a special ban, it is believed that some unknown author wrote the artistic story of Ruth, showing that the royal house of David sprang from a Moabitish woman who had embraced Judaism. Malachi, too, protested against the evil of marrying daughters of a "strange god"; but the forced divorces he regarded as a still greater evil:

"Ye cover the altar of God", he cried,
"with tears, with weeping, and with sighing,
Insomuch that He regardeth not the offering any more.
Neither receiveth it with good will, at your hand.
And ye say: 'Wherefore'?
Because the Lord hath been witness
Between thee and the wife of thy youth,
Against whom thou hast dealt treacherously,
Though she is thy companion
And the wife of thy covenant; . . .
For 'I hate putting away (divorce)',
Saith the Lord God of Israel,
'And him that covereth his garment with violence',
Saith the Lord of Hosts.
Therefore, take heed to your spirit, and deal not treacherously". (Malachi II: 11-16).

However, Ezra's strenuous measures must be judged in the light of the sad facts of his day. Without his efforts, it is doubtful whether the Jewish people would have maintained so comparatively high a degree of racial and religious purity through ages of prosecution. The Rabbis said that "if Moses had not anticipiated him, Ezra would have received the Torah". In the light of historic studies, we know that the Torah was only begun with the Ten Commandments of Moses, and that it received its present form about a thousand years later, at the hands of the priest-scribe, Ezra. If our people has come to be known as "Am hasefer", the Nation of the Book—the Bible, it is due to the service of Ezra, the "Sofer", the ready scribe of the law of God, and to his followers, the Soferim.

BIBLE READING IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS DISCUSSED BEFORE LEGISLATURE.

The bill introduced at a session of the State Legislature of Minnesota allowing the reading of the Bible in the public schools was given its final hearing in the House Chamber on Tuesday, March 27, 1917. The bill has been opposed by a large number of collegemen and aldermen of various denominations, the B'nai B'rith lodges of St. Paul and Minneapolis being particularly active. Among those who spoke against the bill at the hearing were Dr. I. L. Rypins, Gustavus Loevinger and Emanuel Cohen.

JEWS APPOINTED TO IMPORTANT POSITIONS.

Seven Jews were appointed by the provisional government to important government positions. All of these are lawyers of prominence. M. Goldstein was appointed chairman of the committee of Ministers which will decide upon the legality of the arrests made within recent weeks; Halpern was made member of the Council of the Ministry of Justice; Grusenberg, Kalmanowitch, Sheftel, Kaplan and Ginsburg were appointed members of the Council of Ministers.

M. Vinaver is a member of the committee of Ministers which was appointed to work out a plan for the coming constitutional convention.

One hundred and eleven Jews have thus far been admitted to the bar in Moscow since the overthrow of the old government.

M. Bernstein, a wealthy Petrograd Jew, donated the sum of 250,000 roubles to found a Jewish Temple of Liberty in honor of the Russian revolution.

AMERICAN JEWS CAN NOW VISIT IN RUSSIA.

Will Be Goverened by Regulations Covering Other Aliens, Washington Is Told.

Washington, May 12.—All doubt that may have existed as to the right of American Jews, either native or naturalized, freely to visit Russia was removed by the receipt at the Russian Embassy of notification from the Petrograd foreign office of the exact terms of the decree emancipating the Jews of Russia from all of the onerous restrictions under which they have lived for so long.

Their entrance into Russia will be governed by the same stipulations which apply to all other aliens.

The Jewish Parties in Poland

Polish Jewry, passing through a tremendous economic crisis, has not only maintained itself but has struggled onward, to the security of a national, cultural future. It is aware that the existence of the individual is dependent on the existence of the collective whole. It is alive to the fact that every year a new generation of children embark upon life, and that these children have to be secured for Judaism. The Zionists have entered upon this task joyfully, realizing that it is their duty. Leaders are lacking—Rabbis and teachers—who can develop the Jewish spirit in the youth. But these difficulties will disappear. Already there are in the Warsaw University two hundred Jewish students of both sexes who are Nationalists. The Jewish gymnasium and the Hebrew elementary schools are augmenting the forces needed for this purpose, and after the war, a seminary for teachers will be established with the same end in view. All that is needed now is that the leaders be given the ability to hold out. If this can be done, the Jewish future in Poland is very hopeful.

The Polish Jews are very poorly organized. Only a small number of them are represented on the various committees and political parties. Although the possibilities for the masses to participate in politics are much greater than in the past, owing to the municipal elections and the anticipated changes in the qualifications of voters, the masses do not assert themselves, and the only time their existence is felt is at the elections.

The assimilationists are few in number. In Warsaw, out of 335,000 Jews, only 1,000 families may be classified as assimilationists.

The so-called "Impartials" are a group containing a few persons of note, who are either Zionists or Nationalists, but who refuse to commit themselves to the political platform of either the Zionists or the Assimilationists.

The Zionists are well organized; they have their Central Committee in Warsaw in touch with seventy cities. Besides there are Zionist centers all over Poland. The cultural work is really the backbone of Zionism in Poland, where there is a widespread interest in the revival of Hebrew, which explains the enthusiasm which the establishment of the Hebrew schools has evoked. These Hebrew schools do not indicate a hostile attitude towards Yiddish, but are an expression of the natural enthusiasm of every Zionist to bring about a closer union with Palestine through the Hebrew language. The children are particularly enthusiastic and Hebrew is becoming the language of their childish conversations.

In addition to the elementary schools, the nurseries established by the Zionist Curatorium, and the Hebrew intermediary school Jabnei, in Lodz, there are in both of these cities gymnasia which may properly be designated as national Jewish educational institutions. Polish is the language of instruction, but Jewish subjects are imparted in Hebrew and the spirit of the school is national.

It is not easy to determine the numerical strength of the Zionist organization in Poland, but a fair estimate can be obtained from the tremendous number of cultural and educational institutions and the great demand for Hebrew teachers. Still another striking indication of Zionist strength is the tremendo[illegible] which the Zionists, as indiv[illegible] in the Jewish institutions [illegible] general character.

The real power of the Zionist organization is proved by the Lodz election of thirty-two council members; there are only four Assimilationists and two Neo-Assimilationists. The other twenty-six have a national Jewish platform and belong to the Jewish Election Committee; nine are members of the Zionist organization, as has already been reported in these columns. The Jews of Lodz felt that two grave mistakes, with far-reaching economic and cultural consequences, had been made by the Jews in Warsaw. One was the formation of an illogical "block" by the Zionists, Assimilationists and Chassidin, and the voluntary relinquishment to the Poles of nearly half the mandates. The masses had an intuition of these blunders and manifested their indignation in the tremendous vote cast for the "people's group" which opposed all compromises.

The voluntary surrender of mandates has not mitigated the Jewish position. The brutal attitude of the city council toward the Jews proves again, if proof is necessary, how zealously a national minority must guard every last one of its rights.

The struggle between the various Chassidic leaders continues, but among the younger generation of Chassidim there is a strong leaning towards national Judaism. At the Warsaw elections thousands of Chassadim voted with the People's Group, in spite of instructions to the contrary. In Lodz, the younger Chassidic elements defeated the efforts of the leaders to bring about a union with the Assimilationists.

Two German Rabbis, Dr. Pinchas Cohn and Dr. Karlebach, have taken up residence in Poland, to spread the cult that the Jews are a religious sect merely. On Feb. 1 they established a Yiddish daily, "The Jewish World", the suspension of which is expected momentarily. Their support comes from the German Jewish Assimilationists, and their hope for success is based on the supposition that the Chassidic masses are anti-national. The lofty motive of the propaganda of these two German Rabbis is to rescue the Polish Jews from the clutches of Zionism. On this basis they entered into an alliance with the Gerer Rebbe, with the result that the Chassidic Rebbes of Poland have become involved in a struggle for supremacy.

Anti-Defamation League

During the past few months the League has been engaged in attempting to secure the passage in certain states of a law designed to prevent the publication of discriminatory advertisements, the effect of which would be likely to arouse prejudice against the Jew. As a result of its activities in this connection, the act prepared by the Managing Board of the League, has been enacted into law by the legislatures of the states of Colorado and Maine, and has been passed by the House of Representatives in several other states, under conditions which indicate its early enactment into law.

As the legislative season draws to a close reports will come in more rapidly, and it is hoped that before the next issue of this paper we will be able to report passage of the law in several other states. The close of the legislative campaign will permit officers of the League to devote their attention to other important branches of our work.

One great field of activity which has been only touched has been that which deals with literature used in public schools, which has a prejudicial effect. About two years ago the secretary of the League made a survey of all of the public schools of the country with a view to determining what schools used the "Merchant of Venice" as a part of its regular curriculum for intensive study. The results of that survey, which was made by addressing communications to the superintendents of schools in all cities having a population of ten thousand or over was not satisfactory, as a large number of the superintendents failed to respond to the questionaire which was mailed to them. Many of the superintendents replied that the "Merchant of Venice" was included in their course of study because the college entrance requirement board had listed the "Merchant of Venice" among those readings required for admission to the colleges and universities of the country.

Our first efforts were directed to secure a modification of the admission requirements laid down by the board in question, and as a result of our activities the "Merchant of Venice" was removed from the list of the required readings and included among the optional readings. This important step in the solution of the great problem was accomplished nearly two years ago, and the board of the League then concentrated its attention upon the efforts to secure the discontinuance of the study of this play in the grade and high schools of the large cities. As a result of its campaign, the study of the "Merchant of Venice" was discontinued in a large number of cities throughout the country and considerable agitation aroused against its continued use in other cities. Other organizations then took up the work, and with some degree of suceess. The attention of the League was directed to other problems and for the past year little has been done in connection with this great field of activity. Another reason for the cessation of efforts along this line is the fact that school boards arrange the curriculum for each year during the spring and summe preceding the opening of the school year. During the coming summer, the League expects to devote its energie almost entirely to a determined effor to secure results in those cities which have not as yet taken any steps to discontinue the study of this play.

As a first step in this campaign, and with the approval of the president of the Order, the local lodges of the Order throughout the country are urged to appoint committees to investigate local conditions and report to the office of the League the status of their respective cities. Communications should be addressed to Leon L. Lewis, Secretary, Anti-Defamation League, 1228 Tribune Bldg., Chicago.

There has been so much misunderstanding of the reasons which have impelled the board to take a decisive stand against the intensive study of this play in the public schools that it is proper at this time and in this place to explain in brief why the board considers the matter of such great importance. Many school superintendents are of the opinion that we are too sensitive and that, as a matter of fact, the Jewish students in a class do not as a rule feel any embarrassment of the reading of the play. We are told of instances where the play has been produced in the public schools and where the part of Shylock is acted by one of the Jewish students. We are told that Jewish students vie with each other in an effort to secure the honor of acting the part of Shylock in such school presentations. But the gist of our objection is not the effect which th study of the play has upon the Jewish student, nor are we particularly concerned with his or her feeling when the play is studied in the schools. We are concerned primarily with the effect of the study of the play upon the mind of the young non-Jewish student. The instructor may be fair-minded and may attempt to show that the play is an indictment of the Gentile and not of the Jew He may claim that Shylock has by far the better of the argument throughout the play and that the plot and characters of the play might be turned into potent illustrations of the baneful effect of race prejudice upon human nature. Principal Williams of the Sacramento, Cal., High School, remarks in this connection:

"Personally, I think it depends entirely upon the manner in which it is handled in the teaching. A wise and careful teacher could make the pupil see that while Shakespeare was influenced by the hostile attitude of his day, there is yet much in the character of Shylock to excite sympathy; that he is fully as much sinned against as sinning, and if the teacher has been so forunate as to see Henry Irving act the part, he can leave with the child a sense of shame that Christians were ever so un-Christian as to persecute the Jews as they did in the middles ages".

Superintendent Asher J. Jacoby, of Elmira, N. Y., writes in a similar vein:

"The head teacher of English informs me that when she taught the play it was made the occasion for teaching a broader tolerance for the Jewish race. The students were required to read Marlow's 'Jew of Malta' for contrast with Shakespeare's treatment of the race prejudice question and were required to compare the Old and New Testament teachings in justice and mercy to show whether Jew or Christian was following his religious creed the more closely".

Unforunately, Shakespeare has taken occasion in many passages throughout the play to vent the spleen of the Jew-baiting Venetians against the Jew in such a manner that the young non-Jewish student cannot avoid being affected.

The instructor, no matter how fair-minded he may be, cannot explain away, for example, that passage in the fourth act, where Antonio cries out:

"You may as well do anything most hard as seek to soften that—that which what's harder—his Jewish heart".

Can a young non-Jewish student sitting side by side with a Jewish school mate in a public school room help contrast the difference in race and religion between the Jew and himself, and, having regard to what he was then hearing would he not feel that his Jewish fellow pupils were descendants of unloving grasping progenitors and his inferiors in character? The quotation above is but one of many. What is the effect of th following:

Shylock:
"I hate him for his is a Christian:

He hates our sacred nation,

Cursed be my tribe,
If I forgive him".—Act I, Scene II.

Shylock:
"You call me misbeliever, cut-throat dog,
And spit upon my Jewish gaberdine".

Antonio:
"I am as like to call thee so again,
To spit on thee again, to spurn thee, too".

Launcelot Gobbo:
".....the Jew, my master who,
God bless the mark! is a kind of devil;
.....Certainly, the Jew is the very devil incarnation".

"My master's a very Jew; give him a present! give him a halter: .....I will run .....for I am a Jew, if I serve the Jew any longer."—Act II, Scene II.

Jessica:
"To be ashamed to be my father's child!

O Lorenzo! I shall end this strife,
Become a Christian and thy loving wife".
Act II, Scene III.

Shylock:
"I'll go in hate, to feed upon
The prodigal Christian.....
There is some ill a-brewing
For I did dream of money-bags tonight"
Act II, Scene IV.

Salarino:

Shylock:
"I'll plague him; I'll torture him: I am glad of it".

"I will have the heart of him, if he forfeit; for, were he ,
Out of Venice, I can make what merchandise I will".—Act III, Scene I

Salanio:
"Here comes another of the tribe; a third
Cannot be matched, unless the devil Himself turn Jew".—Act II, Scene I.

Jessica:
(Shylock's daughter)
"When I was with him
I have heard him swear
That he would rather have Antonio's flesh
Than twenty times the values of the sum,
That he did owe him; and I know.....
It will go hard with poor Antonio".
Act III, Scene III.

Jessica:
"He tells me flatly; there is no mercy for me
In Heaven, because I am Jew's daughter".—Act III, Scene V.

Duke:
"A stony adversary, an inhuman wretch
Uncapable of pity, void and empty
From any dram of mercy".

Gratiano:
"Harsh Jew: Thou mak'st thy knife keen: but no metal can,
No, not the hangman's axe, bear half the keenness
Of thy sharp envy".

O, be thou damn'd, inexecrable Jew".
Act IV, Scene I.

Bassanio:
'And curb this cruel devil of his will".

Gratiano:
Entreat some power to change this curish Jew.—Act IV, Scene I.

In the light of all this, can it be denied that the "Merchant of Venice" engenders or produces prejudice against the Jew?

It is the duty of superintendents of schools to arrange the curriculum so as to obtain the very best material in every line of thought. It is not surprising that they have almost uniformly selected the "Merchant of Venice", as it is a favorite classic and a wonderful example of Shakespeare's literary genius; but the common school education is designed to do more than teach our children what is technically best in literature, science and art. The rearing of children, democratically and without prejudice, should be an equal, integral part of elementary education. Is the sacrifice of the general friendly relations between pupil and fellow pupil justified by the admittedly great literary value of the play? There can be no question as to the answer.

It is for the League, through its executive committee and the lodges of the Order, to impress this fact upon the minds of school superintendents in every city and village, so that one important factor in creating prejudice will be eventually removed.

CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS.

Announcement is made that the Program Committee of the Central Conference of American Rabbis will shortly send out the tentative program for the Twenty-eighth Annual Convention of the Conference, to be held in Buffalo, N. Y., June 28th to July 4th, inclusive.

Word comes from Buffalo that Temple Beth Zion and Rabbi Louis J. Kopald will make unusual preparations for the comfort of the members who will attend and for the entertainment of the Conference. The Jewish community of Buffalo is issuing a special personal invitation to every member of the Conference, urging him to attend.

The Executive Committee issued a letter to the Presidents of Congregation served by the members of the Conference, urging the necessity of the attendance of Rabbis at those meetings, and suggesting that the Congregations continue the custom of defraying their Rabbis' expenses. Rabbi Isaac Landman, the Corresponding Secretary of the Conference, announces that he has been in receipt of a larger number of favorable replies from the Presidents of Congregations, than heretofore.

The program will contain several extraordinary features. One especially is announced on the discussion of "The Practical Problems of the Ministry". A paper on the subject will be read by Rabbi Samuel Koch, of Seattle, Wash., and then the Conference is to divide itself into groups to discuss the various propositions laid down in the paper.

MAJOR GENERAL LEONARD WOOD GUEST OF B'NAI B'RITH.

Major General Leonard Wood was the guest of honor of Akiba Lodge No. 173 and of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of District No. 1, Tuesday evening, April 10th, at the B'nai B'rith Headquarters, New York. President Rosenzweig presided. The General delivered a very interesting address on "Patriotism and Preparedness." Brothers Theodore Schmerl, William H. Silk and Myer L. Victorius were the Committee on Arrangements.

MEN WHO FURNISHED THE SINEWS OF WAR FOR OUR REVOLUTION.

Extract from "Kansas City Star".

Another financial patriot of that fateful period, who was closely associated with Robert Morris in all his various schemes for raising money, and who gave liberally of his own means not only to the cause itself, but in personal loans to the often impecunious statesmen who were sponsors for it, was Haym Salomon. He might easily have avoided his patriotic obligations and hid himself behind the shelter of a hyphen, for he was a Jew, born in Poland, and was familiarly known among the statesmen of those days as "our little friend on Front Street". Salomon was Morris' confidential agent in all his transactions—he was the man to whom Morris first appealed when he wanted "real" money and wanted it quick. And he always got it. Salomon himself contributed more than $600,000 out of his own personal funds for the uses of the army and navy, and a good portion of that sum never came back to him, nor to his heirs. The secret negotiations with France and Holland by which money and credit were obtained in those countries were largely conducted by Haym Salomon, who enjoyed not only the confidence of the patriots of this country but that, as well, of the kings and courts of Europe who were friendly to the United States. Salomon's place on Front street, Philadelphia, was the rendezvous of the agents, consuls and ambassadors of the countries then in allegiance with us, all of whom regarded him in the light of a confidential friend and adviser. He was the intimate friend and associate of his fellow countrymen, General Pulaski and General Kosciuszko. And his private purse was always open, not only to the chevaliers, but to the generals of the American army and to the members of Congress. Just the kind of a patriotic money lender Haym Salomon was will perhaps be better understood by quoting from a letter of Madison, who was long a pensioner upon his bounty:

"The kindness of our little friend on Front Street, near the coffee house, is a resource that will preserve me from extremities, but I never resort to it without great mortification, as he obstinately rejects all recompense. The price of money is so usurious that he thinks it ought to be extorted from none but those who aim at profitable speculations. To a necessitous delegate he gratuitously spares a supply from his own private stock". And the delegates, by all accounts, drew liberally upon that private stock.

But Haym Salomon was not only willing to shed his money for the cause—he was ready and willing at any time to shed his blood as well, and twice he narrowly escaped death at the hands of the British, to whom his loyal activities were very obnoxious. As early as 1775 he was arrested as a suspected "patriot" and thrown into prison. Later, in 1778, Sir Henry Clinton had him arrested for a spy and charged him with attempting to burn the British fleets which lay in the harbor of New York. He was tried and condemned to death. But he put his hard money to work again from outside his dungeon and effected a remittance of the sentence. He was still regarded with suspicion and his renewed activities in the service of his country soon brought the British guards again to his doors in New York, where he lived for a short time after his release from prison. But he eluded them in a spectacular flight, escaped from New York and made his way back to "Front Street, near the coffee house," in Philadelphia, his home town, where he resided until his death in 1785, honored and respected by every public man of the day to whom his valuable patriotic services to his country, in its time of greatest need and darkest promise, were known and understood.

A NOVEL ENTENTE.

A very novel suggestion for a political alliance in the near East, at the close of the war, was made by Mr. Norman Hapgood, in his syndicate letter, which was released for publication in this country on April 8. The suggestion is for an entente among a Jewish State in Palestine, a new Arab Kingdom and a new Armenian State. "On these lines", Mr. Hapgood says, "there has been one new suggestion made about the war and its effect upon the Settlement of the Jewish problem, connected with the British success in Asia Minor. It is that there might be formed an entente between a Jewish State in Palestine, a new Arab Kingdom to be proclaimed by Great Britain and a new Armenian State. Arabs, Jews and Armenians always get along well together and would form a friendly group of small nations at the strategetic points in the trade routes of the world".

THE AMERICAN JEWISH WOMAN TAKES HERSELF TO ACCOUNT.

By Mrs. Jacob Harris.

A group of Jewish women in Minneapolis have put before themselves the question: "What are we doing to help our war-stricken Jews of Europe"?

The women of the warring nations, noble and common alike, felt as soon as the war broke out that much of their country's welfare depends upon them. Without hesitation they abandoned extravagance and frivolties and put their shoulders to the wheel. The world now stands amazed at their display of genius, zeal, bravery and endurance.

America has enjoyed the blessings of peace and with peace unprecedented prosperity. As American citizens we Jews have shared this peace and prosperity, till we are now estimated to possess greater wealth than do all the rest of the Jews of the world together.

But while as Americans we are at peace, as Jews we are at war, for no less than 500,000 Jewish soldiers are fighting and dying in the trenches. These represent from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 war-stricken Jews.

Belgium, a nation of 7,000,000, suffered and all the world came to the rescue. But the Jews have virtually only their American brethren to help them. But these, though richer than all the rest of the Jews of the world, have given less than the Jews of Moscow alone. In simple terms, the American Jews, thinking themselves very liberal, have given $1.00 a year per capita since the war began. In other words, they have given as much as their average child spends for candy in a month.

Thoughtless selfishness, pure and simple, has been their rule. In the face of suffering and privation such as history has no record of, the Jews of America are indulging in extravagances so flagrant that our non-Jewish neighbors are beginning to notice and to "talk."

Let us ask ourselves, if not as a people, at least as women, for it is we women, let us be truthful, who set the standard of life true or false, let us ask ourselves what we are doing for those who are martyrs to the Jewish cause. For we cannot help hoping that this hell-fire may melt the iron hearts of the rulers of the world and they may provide us, [illegible]'s step-children, with a roof [illegible] our own.

Let us Jewish women of our blessed United States as a whole ask ourselves the question, what are we doing to help our war-stricken Jewish brethren? And let us dare to answer as the group of Minneapolis women dare to answer themselves: "We will henceforth set a new standard of life. We will not judge a man's prosperity by the costliness of his wife's clothing, nor by the extravagance of her parties, but we will judge him by the amount he gives to save the starving. We shall take our pleasures, for pleasures make for life, but we shall take them inexpensively. If we vie with one another it shall be in praise of the good and simple. And instead of loud applause we shall promote the quiet neighborly hour that feeds the spirit.

"And finally we shall not spend, however great or small, an amount without asking ourselves if we must spend it. If we must not we shall be honest with ourselves and give that amount not spent to the end that the starving may eat. Seven cents a day will save a human life".

Each woman who thinks this ideal worth while can become a missionary for the cause of humanity by acting upon it herself and by getting ten other women to live up to the ideal. Thus there will be formed a chain of happy and cheerful givers that will lend strength and courage to the men and women entrusted with the great relief work.

HONORS FOR ITALIAN JEWS.

Various Italian coreligionists have recently been the recipients of honors from the government. Among them are Cavaliere Moise Foligno, of Ancona, a former president of that community, and now resident in Milan, who has been made commander of the Order of the Crown of Italy. A similar honor has been paid to another resident of Milan, Advocate Angelo Barzilai. Other recipients of this honor are Dr. Corrado Segre, Professor of Higher Geometry at the University of Purin, and member of the Royal Academy of Science of that city; Professor Aronne Torre, inspector under the Ministry of Public Instruction, [illegible] Cavaliere Lelio Fubine, who fills [illegible] Jewish and general offices. Recent [illegible] to the rank of Cavalier of [illegible] order are Professor Adolfo [illegible] Advocate Michele Ottolenghi [illegible], and Signor Dario Levi of [illegible]

CONFIRMATION.

The Festival being again at hand to commemorate the day, when from Sinai's height was proclaimed that Divine Code, which each succeeding age has adopted as the basis for its moral law and which we reiterate by holding the ceremony of confirmation, a thought should be given by the elders to the fact that simply having the children go through the ceremony is not sufficient, but that they themselves must set an example by their actions in order to make a proper impression.

There seems to be something lacking at present, for notwithstanding the fact that the ceremony of "Confirmation" takes place year after year and of there being so many organizations who claim that their object is to keep their members in touch with Jewish ideals and to have more reverence for the Sabbath and other holy days, not a day passing without one receiving a pamphlet of some kind calling attention to these objects, when the time comes to show that we have some reverence for all the days which help to maintain our historical consciousness, we not only do things which are unnecessary, but sit back and take part in affairs with our Christian friends, which could easily be postponed to some other day or hour, if only the proper suggestion was made; for the Christians have reverence for the historical days of the Old Testament and respect the Jew who does not neglect them.

If there is to be any real result from the ceremony of Confirmation, the proper example must be set by the elders. If they become thoughtless and do things which seem irreverent, the children will naturally follow, no matter what training they may receive elsewhere.

It is not a question as to what days are acceptable to God, for we are taught that God is always with us and every day should be dedicated to him by doing some good act. So far as the Supreme Being is concerned, no particular day of any kind need be observed. It is simply a question of keeping alive the historical consciousness. While the church observes Sunday on account of the traditional ascension of Jesus of Nazareth, it also honors Saturday by reciting a portion of the ritual on the Historical Sabbath.

If all our people would have more reverence for all these and avoid doing unnecessary things on the Sabbath, it would go a great deal further toward solving the present-day problems than all the arguments about Synagogue Service and ritual combined.

No matter as to how many biblical conferences may be held each year and Confirmation may be conducted on so ever an elaborate scale, the problem is up to the layman.

LOUIS L. MICHAELS.

ZANGWILL RETURNS TO ZIONIST MOVEMENT.

Israel Zangwill, the distinguished English author, has announced his return to the Zionist movement, from which he has been alienated since 1905. At a meeting in London, held several days ago, Mr. Zangwill said that it was almost certain that, at the end of the war, Palestine would fall into the hands of the Allied Powers. This historic event, he said, will give the Zionists the opportunity to realize their ideal, which is the establishment of a publicly secured, legally recognized home for the Jewish people in the Holy Land.

Mr. Zangwill explained that he left the Zionist movement in 1905 because he had become convinced that it would be impossible to create a Jewish State in Palestine under Turkish rule. At that time he felt it his duty to seek some other land to which Jews, dwelling in lands of persecution and oppression, could flee and establish themselves on an autonomous basis. He had, therefore, organized the Jewish Territorial Movement, which had given serious consideration to Great Britain's proffer of Uganda, in Africa, to the Jews, and had investigated the possibilities of Cyranaica, Australia, Mexico, Central America and other possible territories for a Jewish "haven", but had not been able to find a suitable location. Now, however, when Palestine was about to become free, and there was strong possibility that it would be given to the Jews, said Mr. Zangwill, he wants to do his utmost for Zionism and give it his full support.

JEWISH OFFICERS IN THE RUSSIAN ARMY.

By decision of the new government, M. Gutchkoff, the Minister of War and Marine, has issued an order permitting the promotion of Jews to all commissioned ranks in the army, and abolishing all restrictions hitherto enforced against our co-religionists in the army and navy. The news has been received by the forces with enthusiasm.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

The Silver Jubilee and the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the American Jewish Historical Society was held in New York on Sunday, April 22, 1917, at Hotel Ansonio. The sessions were unusually well attended.

The business session of the society was held on Monday, at which the reports of the officers were presented, from which it is shown that the membership of the society is now close to the 400 mark.

The following officers and members were elected: President, Dr. Cyrus Adler, Philadelphia; vice-presidents, Hon. Simon W. Rosendale, Prof. Richard J. H. Gottheil, Rev. Dr. David Philipson and Hon. Julian W. Mack; Corresponding Secretary, Albert M. Friedenberg; Recording Secretary, Samuel Oppenheim; Treasurer, Hon. N. B'NAI B'RITH HOLDS SEDER AT FORT LEAVENWORTH, KAN.

On Friday evening, April 6, 1917, Seder was given at the Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Leavenworth for the Jewish inmates, under direction of Morris Abeles, who conducted the services, assisted by Messrs. C. H. and M. Freedberg and Mr. Julius Abeles, all representing the local B'nai B'rith Lodge. Mr. C. H. Freedberg of the B'nai B'rith Lodge spoke on the work the Order is doing all over the world.

Chaplain Axton, through whose kindness and attention much of the success of the Services was due, gave an interesting talk to the boys.

A similar Seder Service was given at the Federal Prison on Saturday evening, April 7th. Those who attended included Mesdames Pevsner and Ettenson, Messrs. C. H. Freedberg, M. Abeles and a number of visitors from Kansas City. Warden Morgan was the first speaker complimenting the Jewish people upon their services in the cause of humanity. Short addresses were also made by Chaplain Solon and Madam Pevsner.

ITALY AND TURKISH JEWS.

The Spanish League of Human Rights has sent a petition to the Italian Premier asking him not to intern Turkish Jews of Spanish origin in view of their Spanish sympathies and old connections. The Italian Union of Jewish Communities made a similar request, which has been granted by the government.

FLAG RAISING BY JEWISH IMMIGRANTS.

Under the auspices of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant A[illegible] America, and its 50,000 mem[illegible] York, a large flag raising by the erstwhile Jewish immigrants, was held on Saturday evening, May 5, 1917, in the heart of the East Side.

Since the break between the United States and Germany and the entry of this country into the world war, erstwhile immigrants have been eager to show their loyalty and allegiance to their adopted country.

A large American flag was unfurled and there were patriotic speeches by men of prominence and the pledge to the flag was given. East Broadway for blocks was illuminated and all the houses of the neighborhood were decorated with bunting and flags. Patriotic airs were sung, demonstrating that Jewish immigrants are solid behind the President.

RUSSIA TO INTERCEDE FOR RUMANIAN JEWS.

A cable dispatch received from Switzerland by Mr. Herbert, the secretary of the American Union of Rumanian Jews, declares that the present government in Russia is ready to intercede in behalf of the Jews of Rumania. The cable states that the representative of the Rumanian Union for Equal Rights for the Jews had an interview with Minister of Justice Kerenski, who is acting Premier while Premier Lvov is at the front, and that Kerenski assured him that the Russian Government will exert its influence in obtaining equal rights for the Jews in Rumania. It is said that the representatives of the Union received similar assurances from authoritative sources in France and in England.

JEWISH RIGHTS IN RUMANIA.

The Jassy correspondent of the "London Morning Post" writes: "I understand, from an authoritative Rumanian source, that the Jassy Government proposes to grant full political and civil rights to the Jews. The Russian revolution and the movement of the Jews in America in favor of the Allies have had a powerful repercussion in Rumania. In this way Rumania herself will settle a question that has keenly interested the Western world".

FRENCH SOCIALISTS AND JEWS.

The National Council of French Socialists, as a result of Jewish representations, have adopted a resolution in favor of demanding of the coming Peace Conference the emancipation of the Jews, as well as cultural rights for them where they reside in large numbers.

Ruth the Moabitess

By Dr. Max L. Margolis
Written for B'nai B'rith News

The little book of Ruth in our Scriptures—it comprises but four chapters—is read in the Synagogue on the Feast of Weeks, Shabuot. Just why it is read at this season of the year it is not easy to tell. It is commonly pointed out that the wheat harvest in which the middle scene of the book is laid coincides in Palestine with this period in the year. Still greater difficulty is experienced in ascertaining just what the purpose of the narrative is. The genealogy of David occurring at the end of the book sufficiently explains why it has been incorporated into the Bible. That alone would make it a part of sacred history. In the Church Bible the story of Ruth, which is laid in the time "when the judges judged", follows immediately upon the Book of Judges. With us—that is, in the order of books as given by the Jewish authorities of Palestine—the book is relegated to the third part which comprises the Writings after the Law (Torah) and the Prophets. Sometimes it appears at the head of the Psalter, apparently in order to preface the collection of hymns ascribed to the authorship of David with the pedigree of the royal bard. Usually it is placed after the Song of Songs among the five Scrolls or booklets which are read in the Synagogue service. The place in the third part of the Bible has been thought to be a clue to the date of the reception of the book among the holy writings and therefore indirectly to the date of its composition. It was written, so it is said, after the prophetic collection had been pronounced sacred, and as the last prophet is Malachi, who prophesied some years before the return under Ezra, the book is said to have been composed in the times of Ezra. The tendency or purpose of the book is said to square with this date. A Christian Bible student who is noted for his fine insight into the sacred literature as literature gives it as his opinion that the beautiful idyll never had an extraneous purpose. Story tellers write stories just because they love to write them. If there be a purpose at all, he claims, it is that a woman will have her way if it comes to being married. But the usual run of Bible commentators are not satisfied with so prosaic a purpose. They assert that, if written in the times of Ezra, its purpose was to protest against the ruthless attitude of the zealous priests towards the intermarriages which were contracted by so many Jews. Ezra ordered the husbands to divorce their foreign wives and to send them away together with their children. This booklet points the lesson that the measure is unnecessarily cruel. Ruth the Moabitess was the ancentress of David. The Torah prohibits matrimonial alliances with Moabites. The rabbis say that the prohibition refers only to Moabitish men and not to Moabitish women. Still the point would have a meaning: a Moabitish women, the mother of a line counting among its members king David and the still greater king to come from his loins, the Messiah. In the genealogy of Jesus in the New Testament Ruth is singled out together with other women whose conduct was not exactly of the conventional kind.

The Torah plainly is against marriage outside the people. The rabbis who are literalists limit the prohibition, except in the cases expressly singled out, to the seven nations whom the Israelites found in the land when they occupied it. As these had died out during biblical times, the rabbinic interpretation clearly becomes much more lenient. Be it remembered that, again in conformity with the latter, the rabbis permit a matrimonial alliance with a Gentile, except in the cases specified in the Torah, if the Gentile is converted to Judaism. Accordingly, a Jew might not marry a Hittite or Canaanite women even if she adopts the faith of the Jew; in all other cases, when a Gentile is converted to Judaism, the ban on marrying a member of the Jewish people is lifted. The rabbis at times welcome proselytes and at other times frown upon admitting Gentiles to the Jewish religion. The attitude was conditioned by the times. But even when a proselyte is admitted, it must be certain that his motive is religious, that he becomes convinced of the Jewish truth. No person is to be admitted who becomes a convert through ulterior motives, for the sake of marrying a Jewish girl. Ruth indeed is held up as the model of a true proselyte, who joins Judaism, comes to seek refuge under the wings of God, from conviction. "Thy God shall be my God." If we take up not the letter, but the spirit of the biblical injunction, it will become clear that the seven nations are enumerated as an example ready at hand. These were the nations with whom the Israelites had contact. The reason is indeed a religious one. The fear is expressed that the foreign party will win over the Jewish to the foreign religion.

In our own days we normally object to marrying out of the fold. Of course, intermarriages occur where the hold of Judaism on the Jewish contracting party has become weak. Still the objection rests upon purely religious grounds, and ought to rest on no other. It is not a question of preserving the purity of the Jewish race. We cannot be more orthodox than were the rabbis. Proselytes have been admitted into the fold and permitted to marry our sons or daughters. Nor would it be advisable nowadays to reject a convert because he contemplates marrying a Jewess. The weakness of human nature must be reckoned with. It is well for religion to regulate it, for it cannot be suppressed. Our position on a subject which in these days of free intercourse between the Jew and the non-Jew naturally obtrudes itself should be guided by wisdom. The accession to our ranks of outsiders should be welcomed. A religious body must believe in the open door. A race, and be it never the purest, is rather invigorated by the admixture of a foreign strain of blood. Parents have a right to be watchful that the union shall be a lasting one. Marriage rests on compatibility of temper. Naturally the momentary attraction may wear off. It is a mooted question whether unions between members of different races or nationalities turn out happy. That, of course, is for the individual family to decide. Then again it frequently happens that the Jew who marries out marries a person beneath his station. That is unfortunate, still again a matter for the individual to decide. Where religion and the public opinion based upon it steps in is the concern that the Jewish party shall not be lured away from his religion and community. Here the experience is that in most cases the Jew is the loser. The Catholics stipulate in all cases of intermarriage that the children shall be reared as Catholics. No rabbi should perform a marriage ceremony between Jew and Gentile unless it is distinctly stipulated that the children shall be reared as Jews. We should otherwise be committing racial suicide. Once that promise is exacted, intermarriage loses its danger to the Jewish cause. As to what constitutes conversion and which rites should be insisted on, on this question the orthodox and reformers legislate differently. What Jewish public opinion is interested in is that the conversion shall take place, and where that fails that the promise to raise the children as Jews shall be exacted. We cannot shut ourselves up in a ghetto. Even in the ghetto such things did happen. We associate with our neighbors. But we must make it clear to them as to ourselves that our objections are guided by no other reasons than the religious. We constitute the minority. The danger to the diminution in our ranks is greater. Purity of the race is not a religious principle. What counts in religion is purity of the family. It should be borne in upon our youth that matrimony is not a private affair solely. The community of which we are a part has a right to exercise jurisdiction. We marry to build a house. As Jews we marry to bring into the world offspring that shall take our place in the community of Israel when we are gone. Normally our households will be happier when we marry within the fold. But if we do go outside to choose a partner, we must not forget that he must become also a member of the community of Israel. Ruth the Moabitess is indeed the model for all similar cases. She chose of her own account to leave her home and kindred and god and to seek refuge beneath the wings of the God of Israel. And she was found worthy to become the ancestress of David. Ezra was right in his day. The children of the mixed marriages spoke half Jewish and half Ashdoditish. The community was threatened with extinction. If, as we are told, in some places of Europe the proportion of intermarriages amounts to more than fifty in the hundred the danger to our continuance is indeed acute. What the percentage is in this country we know not. But it cannot be a large one. It has not assumed alarming proportions. Our attitude should therefore be of constant vigilance, at the same time liberal and wise. Above all, we shall be guided by the interests of the community of Israel. Normally the Isaacs marry Rebekahs, and the Jacobs, Rachels. Where a Ruth offers herself as partner, if she be like the biblical prototype, she should be received with open arms and allowed to become identified with the cause of the Jewish community which she has voluntarily chosen to ally herself with.

By Rabbi Max J. Currick, Erie, Pa.

At about this time the thirty-five children of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3, are moving from the temporary home in which they have lived since July 4, 1912, to their beautiful cottages in Erie County, about fourteen miles from the city of the same name. They are entering a home which for convenience, beauty and comfort cannot be equaled by that of the average child who considers himself much more fortunately placed than these wards of our district. Beautifully situated on a tract of ninety-five acres of high ground, presented to the district by the Jewish people of Erie, there are two cottages, each with a capacity of thirty children. The buildings are in every way modern, the style, finish and furnishings making them by all odds the finest homes in the entire county outside of the city. This does not mean that they have been extravagantly built, but merely that those facilities and house equipments which have hitherto been looked upon as typical of city homes have not been omitted. Running water, electric light, steam heat, modern plumbing, shower baths and numbers of other things that are not ordinarily seen in farm or country houses have all been successfully installed so that everything making for healthful and happy living, so far as material things are concerned, has been provided.

But, of course, these material things are intended to minister to the moral and spiritual. And any one meeting the children of our home will at once recognize the atmosphere as that of a splendid and real home, anything but that of an institution. The children are enabled to lead a normal home life. Their individuality is not suppressed nor confined in the old-fashioned institutional ruts which used to mar the personality of children in the orphan asylums built and conducted on the congregate plan. They meet strangers who come to the home in a friendly, hospitable manner and lack the timidity and backwardness that so often comes with institutionalism. They have the benefits of the free out-of-doors life, and will also acquire that knowledge of nature and agriculture which is the heritage of Americans who came from the farm. They feel thoroughly at home, a feeling that is strengthened by the relations existing between them and the matron, Miss Nettie Eichenbaum. For the matron is really the mother to all of them, takes a motherly interest in their lives, and maintains in the home such intercourse as more fortunate children enjoy with their parents. The change that is noticeable in all of the children soon after their admission is remarkable testimony to the beneficence of the method. Poorly nourished when they come in, as most of them are, they are soon transformed into ruddy youngsters, the sight of whom is a pleasure to the onlooker; the vices and weaknesses of city life are soon eradicated in the fine environment of a typical country home. The children, many of whom attended school irregularly before coming to our home, and had poor and indifferent records, rapidly forge forward to the first places in their classes and win prizes offered for special merit. As a class our children are considered far and away the best children in the district school. The short term of the district school is not, however, considered adequate for the education of our children and the board of governors therefore engages the services of a teacher for several hours each day during the first two months of the vacation. This advantage our children are entitled to, inasmuch as the majority of them will find their careers in the cities and will have to cope with children who have had the advantages of city schools. And their training on the farm, in addition, is something which the average city child misses as long as he lives.

Thus our children are leading the normal American life. They are absorbing the independent spirit of initiative, self-reliance and industry. They have each their own banking account into which they are encouraged to put whatever savings they are able to accumulate. In the cases of the two boys who have been Bar Mitzvah this amounts to a respectable sum inasmuch as the good people of Erie have established the precedent of increasing their banking accounts on such occasions by generous gifts. This leads to the point that the life, though typically American, is also thoroughly Jewish. The governors have in mind the religious convictions of the parents of these children and in consideration thereof the regimen of the home and the customs are all orthodox. It is not easy to maintain a strictly kosher home far removed from the city, but it is done nevertheless. The matron observes the holidays after the traditional Jewish manner and thus the life of the home itself is an important part of the religious education of the child. The governors are now trying to secure the services of a competent person to assist the matron in Hebrew and religious instruction. Nothing that will add to the service rendered by the home to the childred will be omitted, funds permitting.

The buildings of the home are situated on the Ridge Road, about fourteen miles west of Erie. They are, therefore, accessible both by suburban trolley which passes right before the grounds and by automobile. The plans call for three cottages in one group with a central kitchen, though the cottages have separate pantries and dining rooms. The plan is very much on the order of the orphanage at Pleasantville, N. Y., with the exception of the kitchens. At Pleasantville they have found the separate kitchens rather expensive, and our plan is designed to cut down the expense without lessening the individuality and independence of the life of each cottage. Two buildings and a kitchen are now completed, with the exception of the installation of electric current. This is now being done and wires being strung from the municipal plant of Girard and by the time this article is being read the task will no doubt have been completed and the buildings occupied by our children. Many serious problems have been encountered since work was started on the new buildings on Sept. 30, 1913, but all of them have been satisfactorily solved or are on the way to a satisfactory solution. The board of directors have earned the gratitude of the district because of their untiring diligence and conscientious effort in bringing these buildings to the highest point of efficiency and usefulness. They hold the title to the buildings for the District Grand Lodge and also have possession of whatever endowments accrue to the home.

The home is conducted by a board of governors, chosen by the supporters of the home. These are selected from all parts of the four states comprising District No. 3, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and West Virginia; they are elected by a vote taken by mail in which all the lodges and individual contributors to the home participate.

The members from Erie form what is known as the local board. They conduct the affairs of the home between the quarterly meetings of the board of governors. The officers of the board of governors are the following: President, Isidor Sobel, Erie; vice-president, Max Rothschild, Pittsburgh; secretary, Mrs. E. P. Marks, Erie; treasurer, Isador Simon, Erie. The officers of the board of directors are: President, Morris Schaffner, Erie; vice-president, Marcus Feuchtwanger, New Castle; secretary, Isaac Baker, Erie; treasurer, Isador Simon, Erie.

The Erie home has certainly put new life into District No. 3. From the day in 1910 that the convention in Pittsburgh adopted the report of the committee favoring the establishment of a home for orphaned and friendless children in the district there has been manifest a quickening of the activity of the district. The interest in the home is sure to increase. Even such cities as have their own institutions, like Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Newark, are showing a commendable interest in the Erie home and they will no doubt do their full share towards raising funds to liquidate the debt for the magnificent new buildings. The good which is being done for the children will without doubt react upon the entire district. Notable progress has been made n the two short years of the existence of the home. The story of the succeeding years will surely afford even greater satisfaction because then we shall be enabled to see some of the fruit of the labor of our hands. District No. 3 will be justified in aligning itself proudly with its sisters of the B. B. that are doing useful work. And all the more will this pride be justified since every intelligent effort is being made to have the Erie home the very latest word in homes for orphaned and friendless children.

Work is the true friend and consoler of man, raises him above all his weaknesses, purifies and ennobles him, saves him from vulgar temptation, and helps him to bear his burden through days of sadness, and before it even the deepest griefs give way for a time.—M. Caro.

THE KEHILLAH, XXXII

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

When I ask the reader to remember that I entered the venerable Kehillah of Nikolsburg for the first time in 1868, and that I lived there for six years, beginning with 1870, this statement is not mere pedantry, nor vanity based on the wish to make the reader know indifferent details of my own biography. The chronolgy is highly important. The Austrian constitution, issued under the pressure of the revolutionary movement April 25, 1848, granted, for the first time, full freedom of residence to the Jews, and in this way removed the condition responsible for the unnatural crowding of Jews in a provincial town, where they could not possibly make a livelihood, and less so develop their economic and social life. The capture of Vienna in October, 1848, by the Imperial troops, decided the breakdown of the revolution, and the enforced constitution of March 4, 1849, already completed the return of autocracy, which, by the suspension of the constitution December 31, 1851, became an officially acknowledged fact.

This reactionary movement had an influence on checking the emigration from the Kehillah. The Jews, so optimistic in 1848, when five co-religionists were elected to the Reichstag, and one of them, Dr. Adolph Fischhof, became a member of the ministry, were rapidly disillusioned. I was told that in 1849 the ghetto of Nikolsburg was crowded, the population being larger than ever before. Yet—and this is a lesson in the present affairs of Russia—the reaction was not complete. While occasionally a city from which Jews had been excluded for centuries, ordered the expulsion of the newcomers, the restriction of the right of residence was not reinstated. When in February, 1860, the new constitution abolished all restrictions on civil rights for the Jews of western Austria, and when the constitution of December 21, 1867, finally stated in brief terms that all restrictions, both civil and political, were abolished, the movement away from the Kehillah, made rapid strides.

It is now seen that it is of considerable consequence when I ask the reader to remember that I arrived in Nikolsburg in 1868. Another apparently trivial detail must also be kept in mind. Nikolsburg is near the southern border line of the province of Moravia. About three miles south of the town the province of lower Austria begins. This point is important because it explains to us the origin of the settlement of a congregation numbering 3,400 souls in a population of 8,000. The law governing migration proves to us that people compelled to leave their homes will, as a rule, not go farther than they have to. In 1670 the Jews were expelled from Vienna, and from the province of Lower Austria. Most of them sought new homes in the neighboring province of Moravia, and found the opportunity right across the border in the city of Nikolsburg, which was under the jurisdiction of the princes of Dietrichstein, who judging from the attitude of Cardinal Francis of Dietrichstein, the powerful Austrian statesman during the critical period of the War of Thirty Years, seem to have been traditionally sympathetic to the Jews. The denizens of the ghetto of Nikolsburg continued to do business in Vienna and in the country towns of Lower Austria, with the only difference that they could not take up permanent residence there. When in 1848 the prohibition of residence was removed, they slowly began to settle in Vienna, they formed small groups in the provincial towns, and lived scattered in villages in Lower Austria, where they kept stores or from which they peddled in the villages of the neighborhood. They still considered Nikolsburg their home. At least many of them did. Towns like Laa, Mistelbach, Poisdorf had small Jewish settlements, but the people kept their houses in Nikolsburg, and came there regularly for the holy days. On Passover, and on the great fall holy days the ghetto nearly doubled its inhabitants. A few days before Passover and before New Year wagons came rattling over the cobblestone pavement of the ghetto, unloading their occupants and their household goods, and on the night after the last day of Passover, and of Simchath Torah, the same wagons were [illegible] again, to see the excursionists back to their places of business, accompanied by the wishes of their friends, [illegible] them a safe journey and [illegible]. Usually the heads [illegible] families would return to their village or town between the holy days, while women and children remained there during the whole time, which was to them as much of a recreation, as is to our people a trip to the seashore, or to the mountains in summer. The jolliest times were the days between the holy days of Passover and Sukkoth (Hol Hamoed). These days were holidays in the sense that no hard work was done, while at the same time they were free from the restriction imposed on the Jew by the holy days of the first class. The synagogue service did not occupy so much of the time. The women did not do any needlework, and the men could spend the day in the coffee house playing cards or domino. In the evening the young folks would walk up and down the main avenue of the "Gass" including the highway to Bruenn, and usually engagements were announced between the people who utilized the vacation for courtship, or as we ought to say more properly, for allowing the Schatchen to make the necessary arrangements between the parents of the young people.

One must understand what this vacation meant for people who during the whole winter were cut off completely from all social life, except insofar as contact with their neighbors in business created some occasional social pleasure. The Jew was not looked upon with sympathetic eyes in the village where he was the only representative of his class, and he had especially to be careful, not to display any sign of wealth before his neighbors, who considered him as a parasite living on their hard earnings. In Nikolsburg, the young man had his only opportunity to display his heavy silver watch chain, and the young woman, to put on her hat. It would be wrong not to emphasize inspiration derived from religious life. The Jew, living in the village from October to April, and from April to September felt it actually as a privation that he was not able to attend public worship. The Shabuoth festival was only rarely celebrated by a journey to the home city. But the long holiday season, comprising the week of Passover and from three to four weeks in Fall, gave both the men and the women an opportunity to attend the synagogue, and especially the men enjoyed the privileges of being called to the Torah, or enjoying similar synagogal honors, including for the gifted and better educated, the opportunity of leading in the service or blowing the Shofar and the like. These synagogue honors were so manifold that no one need be entirely neglected. There was besides being called up to the Torah, or reciting the prophetic portion (Haftarah) the right of opening the ark at certain solemn prayers, taking Torah out of the ark, dressing it, carrying the Lulav and Ethrog in procession, or—this custom I saw in Nikolsburg only—standing with bouquet in hand, next to the Hazan, and accompanying him in the prescribed waving of it. These honors were sold at auction. As on Sabbath business transactions are not allowed, the law was evaded by not giving the exact amount of the purchase price. So the sexton would call out: "One hundred for the opening of the Ark; two hundred for the right to be called up as Kohen"; and one hundred meant ten or twenty Kreuzer. I remember that I possessed the ambition of making a bid in lump sum for all the honors to be assigned on one of the half holidays of Sukkoth, and I paid sixteen Kreuzer (about six cents), with which I could honor eleven people, two who took out the two scrolls of the Torah, four who would dress them, four who were called to the Torah, and one who stood by the reader, following him with the silver pointer (Segan). An especially interesting type were the old people, who, having retired from business with a modest fortune, went back to the old Kehillah to spend there the balance of their days, chiefly in order to be able to attend services every day. I remember one old man of athletic build, of whose strength in younger years the ghetto told the most marvelous legends, who attended regularly the "Neuschul". where the services ended a little earlier, then went to the "Altschul" so that he could accumulate a few additional merits by responding a few more "Amens", and then he would accompany the rabbi to his house which was about twenty yards distant, and offer him his snuff box.

The religious life of the community, as is easily seen from what has been said was quite intense. Sabbath was universally observed in business. The dietary laws, as far as one can judge private affairs, were also strictly observed. The children were educated in the Jewish school, where three to four hours daily were devoted to Hebrew. When the new school law of 1868 went into effect, the government objected to the overburdening of both teachers and pupils, without forty hours of weekly instruction, but while a reduction may have been conceded, boys and girls still received a thorough training in the ritual and the former studied the whole Torah, and some of the easier parts of the Bible before they left the school. Some people who had moved to Vienna sent their children to Nikolsburg to receive there a good Jewish training, in this way foregoing the other advantages of education in the capital. These people, living for years in Vienna, still continued to pay their dues to the home congregation, although they did not appear among the holy day guests. Similar was the case of others who had moved to the larger towns now open to the Jews. The city of Znaim in Moravia, was one of those from which the Jews had been expelled during the era of expulsions in the fifteenth century. Now a Jewish community had been formed again, mostly composed of people from Nikolsburg. They were too far away to come to Nikolsburg for the holidays, and had to support a congregation of their own. In this way, the old Kehillah declined not only in numbers, but also in the quality of its members, inasmuch as the wealthiest and the most energetic, especially among the younger element, sought homes elsewhere. A great drawback on the development of the town, was the fact that it had no railroad until 1873. There is a story connected with this fact whose authenticity I was never able to investigate, but which was told generally, and also generally accepted as true. The first Austrian railroad, built in 1836, connected Bruenn with Vienna. It is reported that Emperor Ferdinand who was almost an imbecile, said, when he signed the charter, which granted to Baron Solomon de Rothschild, the right to build this railroad: "If that Jew wants to throw his money out of the window, let him have it". A similarity pessimistic view was held by the Jews of Nikolsburg, in common with their non-Jewish fellow citizens. They feared that the railroad would ruin the business of the stage coach owners, and the inns, and would increase the price of labor. So they sent a committee to wait on the Emperor, and asked him not to allow the railroad to pass through their city. There is reason to believe this story to be true, for as people had no experience in laying out the route of railroads, they usually followed the old highways. Nikolsburg was on the highway, connecting Bruenn with Vienna, situated about thirty miles south of the former, and sixty miles north of the latter city. The railroad turns somewhat east going to Lundenburg, which is about fifteen miles from Nikolsburg, and which became in consequence of the railroad a relatively important business and industrial center. In 1873, during the height of the prosperity, which followed the Franco-German War, a railroad was built, connecting Nikolsburg with the two main roads between Bruenn and Vienna. Connections were poor and the crisis soon brought the railroad into the hands of a receiver. It certainly did not help to restore to the old town its former importance. The exodus of the Jews continued, and I remember a pathetic appeal of the rabbi, Dr. Feuchtwang, on one of the holy days, when he quoted (Lam. 1:4): "The paths of Zion are desolate, for no one comes to the feasts". The sentiment which brought the people who had been used to look with pride upon their home city, as pilgrims two or three times a year, naturally had no hold on the younger element.

The process of modernization was slower, just because of this exodus, and because of the strong attachment of the remaining population, to the venerable traditions of the Kehillah. I remember, when in 1872, an attempt was made at synagogue reform in Vienna guided especially by the political idea, which demanded that the prayers for the restoration of Israel to Palestine be altered, the Kehillah was not alarmed, but terribly grieved. It was a shock to think that Jews should so far forget themselves as to advocate a change of the time-honored prayerbook. It never occurred to them that this blasphemy might ever reach the holy Kehillah. Yet, in the latter half of the sixties, shortly before I arrived in Nikolsburg, a religious contention disturbed the otherwise calm religious life. There was no dogmatic difference, but merely a demand of aesthetic changes. The "Altschul" had a Hazan of the old type, a strictly observant and talmudically learned man, who possessed some musical training. He had now a choir of boys, dressed like himself, in gown and cap. The time which the choir occupied in the service required the omission of some of the Piyutim, and I remember the really grief-stricken expression on the face of old Reb Lipman Glaser, when on a holy day, the passages interrupting the Kedushah were omitted. He sighed, saying: "That nonsense they will sing, but that which ought to be said, they omit". Still Reb Lipman was not a fanatic, for he had a son, who graduated from the Breslau seminary, while I was a student at the "Gymnasium". He died in 1914, as Rabbi of Biala, where he had officiated for about forty years. The greatest difficulty was created by other sweeping and radical reforms. The congregation, with the consent of the rabbi, abolished the time-honored custom of "Schulklopfen" and "Schulrufen". This was an official act, which involved, not like the changes in the Altschul only those who attended that synagogue, but the whole community. The oldest member of the rabbinate, Reb Itzig Weinberger, who died in 1868, at the age of seventy-six, and had been assistant to Rabbi Mordecai Benet, gave expression to his grief in a sermon preached on the text (Lev. 18:3): "You shall not walk in their statues", and which he concluded with the emphatic words, that on the Sabbath, when the call "In Schul" was no more heard, Nikolsburg had ceased to be a "Kehillah Kedoshah". In a similar strain, the youngest member of the rabbinate, Reb Moshe Loeb Kohn, harangued his congregation in the Beth Hamidrash. This rebellion incensed the president of the congregation, Sigmund Blau, a man of modern education who had graduated from the "Gymnasium". A special meeting of the trustees was called for the same afternoon; Reb Itzig was summoned, and was told that if he continued in his opposition, he would be suspended. The old man was not dependent on his small salary, for his children in Vienna were quite well to do, but it surely would have broken his heart to lose the position which he had held for over forty years. He yielded, although the Beth Hamidrash declared on the same afternoon that it would bring charges against the president of the congregation before the government authorities, and would have him removed from office. In addition, they threatened with a riot, declaring their determination to lynch the "Buergermeister". [illegible] used were quite strong [illegible] boldest offered to smash the Buergermaster's face, but it did not go so far; peace was restored, but Reb Itzig never forgave the rabbi for his acquiescence in the reforms, and when Dr. Feuchtwang called on him in his last illness, he turned his face to the wall and would not speak to him.

THE HEBREW GYMNASIUM IN JAFFA.

Before the outbreak of the war the Hebrew gymnasium in Jaffa had 718 pupils, more than one-half of whom came from Russia. During the summer vacation of 1914 about 100 of these pupils returned to Russia to visit their parents and could not return to Palestine. Of those who remained in Palestine, about 150 were able to return to their parents when war was declared. There were compelled to remain, however, in Jaffa, over 150 other students whose parents live in the war zones. The gymnasium had to provide for these children. At the present time there are about 500 pupils in the gymnasium; sixty of these are in military service and are receiving training in the officers' school. During the present school year a number of students have been accepted from the gymnasium at Jerusalem, which has been closed. The Jaffa gymnasium gives complete support to seventy-six students and to sixty-three a monthly subvention.

After the entry of Turkey into the war, a number of the teachers were compelled to leave Palestine, and others have been summoned to the colors. Nevertheless, it has been possible to maintain a complete curriculum, competent substitutes having been found for the teachers who were called to military service.

PASSPORTS FOR JEWS.

The State Department has sent a cablegram to Ambassador Francis at Petrograd requesting him to ascertain definitely what attitude the new Russian government will take towards recognition of passports held by American Jews who desire to enter Russia. An answer is expected shortly. A cablegram was sent in view of the fact that the Russian Embassy here has twice issued announcements that Russian passport restrictions against Jews have been removed, which announcements in each instance failed to receive any confirmation from Ambassador Francis.

THE JEWISH LEGACY

By Emil G. Hirsch

If Judaism and the Jew have an enemy more dangerous than ignorance I do not know him. It is to combat this woeful ignorance that I believe the Menorah societies are banded together. Let me avow that I may be stirred by no other appeal so mightily as by that to treasure my Jewish inheritance and to make it the vital element in the construction of my obligation to the past and the present and the future of all Jews of whatever birthland or whatever religious or non-religious predilection. And it is as a Jew that I am concerned about the great possibilities which I begin to see in the Menorah movement.

Alas, it is not only the non-Jew who displays lamentable want of knowledge on things and aims Jewish, for whom the books in which Jew and Judaism have traced the records of their own essential consciousness and conviction are writings sealed with seven unbroken seals. Perhaps the Jew himself is to be credited with even a higher degree of innocence on matters bearing on Jewish life and Jewish hopes.

As I comprehend Jewishness it is distinctly involved in sufficiency of knowledge of Jewish life both as it is now and as it was in the days before. No catechism and no textbook suffices to bring home to us the content and the contention of that which, inherited from our forebears and passing through the long sequence of centuries and experiences, differentiates the Jewish soul from the soul of one not of the household of Israel. In the words taken from Faust with which my sainted father prefaced his volume on the Religionsphilosophie, let me remind you that each of us ought to reacquire what has come to him by inheritance would he be in truth its owner: "Was von den Vaetern ererbt Du hast Erwirb es Dir um es zu besitzen."

Knowledge That Will Make Us Strong.

The reacquiring of the legacy left by predecessors is in sober reality the task pursued in the college curriculum. It fails if it does not make the student master as though he created it himself of what other generations produced, dreamt, felt, and expected. Jewish students therefore in our undergraduate—or for that matter in the graduate—schools should be encouraged to reacquire also what has come to them from their Jewish ancestors and antecedents. Thre is no need for me to remind you of the function played in all of our impulses and resolves by the subconscious. From the unfathomed depths of this mist-enshrouded ocean rise to the surface eddies and currents, gulf-streams and arctic counterdrifts, which carry us along often to our surprise without any apparent co-operation of our own. Prejudice and passion, as well as enthusiasm and zeal, are children of this vast deep. They come not when we call, and when they do come they often hold us in their grasp and sweep us along. Against the perils of these outbreaks from the deep as well as for the utilizing of their force, men must be prepared. The subconscious is the storehouse of all the sentiment and thought to which as sons of our forebears we have become heirs. What these progenitors of ours thought, suffered, what they rebelled against, and in what they found comfort, it is certainly for us to know well. It is they who still own us. But when we know them and know them well we are in a position to harness their strength to our power and eliminate the hindering element of their weakness from our personal equipment. Knowledge of one's past confers power for the doing of one's part now and here.

Keys to Open the Treasure House.

The difficulties in the way are many. In the first place Jewish history and, to use an untranslatable German term, Wissenschaft, are not embraced in the curriculum of the universities. I am glad to perceive that among the ultimate purposes and plans of the Menorah movement is also the establishing of chairs for these now almost entirely neglected and ignored branches. Even for general culture, let alone the cultivation of the finer understandings of and sympathies for the humanities, these studies hold promise of the richest harvest.

Theological seminaries are not properly equipped to supply this fatal deficiency—fatal in a general sense, but particularly fatal for the Jewish student. College men would gladly register for courses in Jewish literature and civilization were these given by recognized members of the faculty. Rabbis named by courtesy. Professors have neither the time nor the qualifications—I judge from my own limitations—to undertake work of the order required and make it effective and beneficial. The preaching Rabbi, for the most part an adjunct to the undertaker and the caterer, has but little leisure to pursue original researches. Yet without these—be it in never so limited a field or corner of the vast dominion of Jewish story and song and speculation or service at the altar of ideas and ideals—vital and vitalizing classroom instruction and inspiration may not be looked for. We need fully endowed professorships manned by Jews of enthusiasm for Judaism and Jewry who are also men of presence and learning, of broad culture and sympathy, of refined speech and manner. Here is an opportunity which in the dominant frenzy for the charities even the most generous of our family have utterly ignored. May they speedily awaken to their duty.

Libraries, too, we must have would we succeed in arousing both the Jewish students and others to the wealth which is ours and which we have permitted to lie unexplored to our own hurt and the loss of many others. Mention has been made of the kindly disposition displayed toward the Menorah organizations by the university authorities. While these expressions of approval are acceptable, I know that little is done by the authorities to increase the Jewish books in the library. Perhaps the hospitality on the shelves is extended to one or the other ordinary edition of the Talmud or the Megillah. But with the exception of the Harvard and Yale, the Johns Hopkins and the Columbia collections, our universities are very poor in Judaica. I hope that the Menorah societies will take the lead in efforts to remedy this situation which certainly contributes to the ignorance on things Jewish prevalent at our educational institutions.

The Misleading Cult of Charity.

To me the most hopeful possibility of our movement is the outlook that in consequence of a deeper understanding of the history and the ideals of Judaism the now disastrous but almost prevailing construction of Judaism as a scheme of charity will be modified if not entirely discarded. After all, this cult of charity is one of the insidious contagions fallen upon us by our contact with the Christian church. Paul's mistranslated rhapsody about love has unconsciously affected our interpretation of the obligations entailed as the highest in our religious or historical relations with fellow Jews. We have heard it proclaimed that of hope, faith and charity, charity is the greatest, and we have forgotten to inquire into the real value of the terms here used. Charity is not of Jewish coinage. The revised version very wisely has replaced this noun by another and made love the recipient of this ecstatic recognition and exaltation. The Hebrew 'Hessed is by no means to be confounded with charity and not even with love. The strong undernote of reciprocity and of justice is audible in every emotion or every action which is dignified as being of 'Hessed. At all events, charity at its best is palliative. The ideal 'Olam of which the Jew dreams, the social order which he has before him in vision, is such as makes charity useless and superfluous. Justice is the insistent outcry of Judaism. Where it holds men and movements in inspiration, almsgiving and other ebullitions of often arrogant condescension and self-admiration on the part of the wealthy are relegated to the store of lost and pernicious arts. The wider acquaintance with Jewish thought and practice that study of things and experiences Jewish will bring to power cannot but demonstrate that in many vital respects much vaunted modern Charity, the idol to which we have been building shrines, is far behind the provisions and the precepts and practices which expressed for the Jew the implications of Gemilluth 'Hassadim.

The Aristocracy of the Educated.

Jewry needs the loyalty of the Jewish college men and women. If college education means anything it means that they who have had its advantages are equipped for the leaders' posts. The American people has looked with increasing faith to the alumni of the universities for guidance and example. Jewry, too, has the right to ask that the sons and daughters of its household shall to the helm. As yet little of this expectation has come to pass. As yet they, among the increasing number of Jewish graduates, are few and far between who have risen to the obligation or who have been impressed with the enthusiasm and devotion which noblesse oblige implies. The men and women of higher education are the only nobility which democracy of our type shall recognize. Nobility by the grace of the purse or the accident of birth in a certain section of our cities is intolerable. But this distinction comes with the consecration of education free to all who would seek it; it spells service. It is the only aristocracy a self-governing people shall acknowledge. Happily Jewry has always been democratic and always has assigned duty to the nobility won by learning. The learned man was the aristocrat in the Israel of the Rabbis. High-priest had to yield the pass to the learned man even if the learned non-priest was of tainted birth.

I have often wondered why the graduates of our colleges, far from being among the co-servants of the Rabbi, are perhaps less inclined than are others to co-operate with him. Is it because they believe that the Rabbi has no college education? Let me compose their suspicion. The day of the Rabbi by courtesy of the congregation or that of the reporter is past. A century almost has run to its burial since Rabbis in Germany flocked to the universities. And in America the graduated Rabbis are few who have not enjoyed as thorough an academic training as have the lawyers and the physicians and engineers among us. It is a deplorable fact that among none exists so much miso-Rabbinism—if I may coin the term—or Rabbiphobia, as among the Jewish college graduates. Perhaps it is the fault of my profession. I avow my guilt, but the profession as a whole deserves a better treatment at your hand.

A Plea for Broader, International Judaism.

Maybe you distrust all theologies and therefore also look askance at the theologians so called. Perhaps Rabbis are given to one-sided constructions of the meaning of Judaism. Perhaps one or the other of you believes that the peculiar lapse of tongue which is ascribed to one who had a function in the graduating exercises of the first class sent out from one of our theological schools was prophetic of the shortcomings of all of their kind. I repeat what was told me, of course in jest, by one of the members of that class, a class certainly remarkable in every regard. Said the presiding official at this function: "Young gentlemen, you are now commissioned to dissimulate Judaism". A slip of the tongue, this substituting of the word dissimulate for disseminate. I say that not many of my profession have dissimulated Judaism for all this official substitution. It is true some of us are not in accord with the narrow nationalism professed by some. I may be pardoned for venturing to say that misconstructions of the content of Judaism are as frequent among you as they are in our American Jewish pulpits. I plead for a wider fellowship than what nationalism or sectarianism may imply. I would not teach one-sided Judaism. Whatever you may have been led to credit concerning my position, I may claim that what I have attempted to bring home to my congregation as the content of Judaism has always been based on the conception that Judaism is much more than a mere religion and much more than mere Palestinian neo-nationalism. Jew is Jew by birth—not by subscription to dogmas. Jewish culture certainly attained unto its highest in the Jewish God-conception and the notion of true socialism, the socialism of justice and equity therefrom resulting. If you are afraid of dogmatism you are on solid Jewish grounds. My teachers—far-famed as scholars and liberal interpreters of their Jewish inheritance—certainly never disowned or disguised the truth that we Jews are an historical group continued through descent from generation to the next—a group with a distinct orientation toward life and its meaning, with a distinct consciousness of its own individuality among other groups composing the human family. Palestinianism does not appeal to me except as one of the many incorporations of the many-grouped Jewry. I would have a larger field. An international self-conscious and loyal Judaism spells greater service than a localized national Judaism. But because we are a people therefore we should learn to know our people's past and from it construe its destiny and duty as yet unfulfilled.

A Program for Today and Tomorrow.

Geiger used to emphasize as his motto, Aus der Vergangenheit schoepfen, in der Gegenwart leben, fur die Zukunft arbeiten. I would bring to your affection this program of my great teacher. Menorah men and women should be able to draw inspiration from the glorious past which is theirs. They must live in the present, but also prepare the day of larger things to come tomorrow. Without yesterday no tomorrow. Judaism is an historical force. Its self-consciousness is rooted in the past of suffering and triving, of dreaming and doing, of hoping and helping, which is its own biographical record. Judaism must again be a living force in our day, and that not last and least through you and your leadership. Then it will also have a future larger than what Palestinian segregation and isolation, at least to my thinking, seem to promise. But the future is not as yet our opportunity. The day that is certainly is. For that opportunity I welcome as of good augury the Menorah societies. We graduates shall stand by the undergraduates. They need our counsel and ask for our moral and material help. Let me hope that we will not fail to do what is asked of us and still more.

And if you find comfort in the circumstance that I who may have been looked upon by you as a Saul seemingly now have joined the dancing band of Prophets I shall not gainsay your pleasure. Publish it if you so choose in Askalon and in Gath. I never was what many of you have painted me to be—an assimilationist. I never cared for what the Goyim would say. I am and have been always a Jew, which, however, made me no less loyal an American and no less grateful a debtor to the land across the sea which gave me most of my education, and to the torch of learning held aloft by its greatest whereat I lit my flickering weak taper. Into the cistern from which I drank, just because I am a Jewish Jew, I shall not throw a stone.—(The Menorah Journal.)

FIRST ANNUAL CONFERENCE ON RELIGION AND THE SYNAGOG.

The first annual Conference on Religion and the Synagog met in Chicago on Sunday evening, April 15, and continued its sessions until Tuesday evening. The program as tentatively outlined was carried out without change. The attendances at all sessions were qualifyingly large, more especially those which were held in the evening. The morning and afternoon meetings, intended for the closer consideration of Jewish problems naturally were less well attended, but even they exceeded expectations. The discussions of the papers brought out divergent opinions, and as well as the papers themselves helped create the thought that the Conference on Religion and the Synagog should become a regular annual event. Many of the Rabbis of the neighboring communities attended, and were the guests of the Chicago Rabbinical at lunch on Monday and Tuesday.

The Conference met on Sunday at Isaiah Temple and listened to an address of welcome from the President of the Chicago Rabbinical Association (the address is printed in extenso in the columns of this issue of the B'nai B'rith News), to Professor Foster and Dr. Emil G. Hirsch (whose address will appear in extenso in the near future). On Monday, both morning and afternoon sessions were held at B'nai Sholom Temple Israel. Dr. Newmark in the general tendencies in Jewish Religious Thinking, in which he dealt with the conceptions of God, immortality, freedom of will, and discussed in detail the claim of science and immutable law. Professor Shaffer outlined the tendencies of modern philosophy as leading up to James and Bergson. The evening session at which Professor Boas read a paper, and Rabbi Samuel Cohon urged the need of a closer affiliation of the Reform Synagogues led to the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas, It is desirable to have a closer co-operation between the Congregations of this city to further the general religious work of the Jewish community of Chicago; Be it

Resolved, That a preliminary meeting be called as soon as feasible by the Chicago Rabbinical Association to discuss the formation of a local Federation of Synagogues and that an invitation be extended to the Jewish congregations of the city to send to such preliminary meeting a delegation of five to consist of the Rabbi, President and three other members of the congregation.

At the Tuesday morning meeting Dr. Hirsch outlined the present conditions of the synagog—its limitations, its prospects and compared the condition of American Jewry—religiously—with that of other countries. The discussion included the Problem of Sabbath and Religious School. In the afternoon Dr. Kaplan's paper, well thought out and well written, elicited considerable discussion—negative on the part of Dr. Newmark, and affirmative to a considerable extent by Dr. Hirsch. The conference closed with an address by Dr. Berkowitz of Philadelphia.

New Year's Eve	Sun., Sept. 16

Mindful of the blessings which we enjoy in common with our fellow citizens, let us, with loyal hearts, be ever devoted to our land of civil and religious liberty.

Next unto the duties which we owe to Him to whom we bow in reverence is the duty which we, as citizens of a free land, owe to that government wherein our rights are established and our liberties made secure.

AN IMPORTANT LINK IN THE CHAIN OF JEWISH EMANCIPATION.

The momentous change that has occurred in Russia and its effect in removing the disabilities of Russian Jewry call for thoughtful consideration on the part of every Jew. Naturally we are all jubilant. We only hope and pray that the change has come to stay. We know that there are still countries left in which the Jew has not as yet come into his [illegible] may safely expect that they will follow suit. And considering that the bulk of our people reside in Russia, we may speak of the event as constituting the most important link in the chain of Jewish emancipation begun at the end of the eighteenth century. Those of us who stand committed to the belief in the permanency of the dispersion have indeed no other policies to pursue save the securing of civic rights to the Jew in whatsoever land he may dwell. Our orthodox brethren look upon the termination of the dispersion as a millennial event which does not much affect their status in the long interim. Irrespective of the views we may hold it is eminently desirable that we be practical. For practical purposes we are and shall continue in the dispersion for a long time to come. It is incumbent upon us to prove that Judaism will thrive in freedom as well as in misery and bondage. A century may not be a long period to establish a fact. Nor was it a century of freedom for all Jewry. A Jewry half-free half-slave cannot be said to have been free. It will be argued that the miserable condition of Russian Jewry alone during that time with all that was attendant thereon, like enforced migration and the like, acted as a check to keep even the freer Jewries faithful to their heritage. We admit that freedom has led here and there to a weakening of the hold which Judaism had upon our fathers. We cannot be blind to the [illegible] case. When freedom is to reign in every Jewish habitation the world over perchance we question ourselves as to whether the Judaism that gave rise to generations of martyrs in the days of inquisitorial persecution will be strong enough to survive freedom. It were a poor opinion of the spiritual potencies of our religion to even doubt its survival in the changed conditions. [illegible] to take thought. The [illegible] attrition are great. The hold [illegible] everywhere in the world seems to be weakening. Individualism is rampant. Every man is a law unto himself and is little concerned with the fate of those in lower stations. The cultured classes always show a disposition to topple over. It was so in Spain. It was so in Biblical times. We take it that the majority of our people have the holy will to continue as Jews. We believe that we have still tasks to perform. If we have been placed in the dispersion to teach mankind, then surely we may count on long years before us in which to do it. We do not proselytize as our neighbors do. Our organization must be kept up as a mute witness to the truth that is in us. No religion can subsist unless it believes itself to possess the whole truth. Tolerant, of course, we must be. We have suffered enough from the opposite. We may even be modest to claim that we have at least a measure of truth. We have no quarrel with Christian piety. But we wish recognition for Jewish piety. We shall probably have to redouble our vigilance lest freedom rob us of that which is even more priceless than liberty, our religious convictions. These take shape as a set of doctrines, but more so as a history, a sacred heritage. The Jewish consciousness must be built up. Probably we shall find that our organization needs strengthening. The synagogue and the school will have to become more positively Jewish. Our children must be taught more of Hebrew, more of the Scriptures, more of Jewish literature, more of Jewish history. If heaven is good to us to spare us the task of alleviating distress due to abnormal conditions of persecution, we shall have the poor always with us, especially the poor in spirit. An Order like ours will have tasks in plenty. Our philanthropic institutions must be kept up. Our social work must go on. Above all we must conciliate the Jewish classes and masses and the various strata among us. We must keep Jew and Jew together, and particularly Jew and Jewess. Jewish solidarity must be strengthened. If Judaism is to live in the world, it need not be of the world. No religion is of the world. There is much evil in the world. It must be combated. Not that Judaism should become other-worldly. But it must seek to project the other world into this. Indeed, the more we are freed from looking after the material needs of Jewry, the less waste there will be in conducting and re-conducting immigrants, the less the race will call for attention, the more leisure we shall have for cultivating the Jewish soul that it may soar to heights undreamt of. We must not be content merely to take. We must give. We must seek to be original. Then indeed our freedom shall become a blessing to ourselves as well as to the world. The recent link in the chain of Jewish emancipation sets the Jewish energy free to do by the world that we have hitherto been hindered in doing through the world's short-sightedness. And for effective Jew-service our forces must be united. We must not disssipate our energy by unfruitful and undignified, nay injurious, quarrels. Let us close our ranks. We shall probably still work along different lines. But let us all work towards the same end: to preserve the Jew intact, the free Jew in the free world.

THE ENTRANCE OF THE UNITED STATES INTO THE WAR.

Whatever views may have been held by individual citizens about the desirability of this country's participation in the world war, all voices are now hushed once the step has been taken. We still hope and pray it may prove a prelude to a speedy peace such as all nations are longing for, and that ere an American soldier will be called to serve in the trenches some way will be found for bringing the two belligerent sides together to compose their differences. It is truly now a world war, and thoughtful men begin to be apprehensive about the staggering misery which will be engendered. Already world famine looms up in the horizon. At present the nation scarcely realizes the portentiousness of the undertaking it has entered upon. When our young men return maimed and crippled, if they return at all, and the pall of mourning overcasts many a home, the horror of it all will stupefy us. What our duty is in the present hour is obvious enough. Our patriotism must be of the highest. We shall give to our country all that we are and own. That the Jew will nobly respond to the call of duty is a foregone conclusion. The slurring remark of a soldier in high command that the impression exists that we Jews do not show a ready disposition to defend the flag was as uncalled for as it was unjust, untrue. We see now the importance of a work like that of good brother Simon Wolf.

Already Jewish men are enlisting in Army and Navy. There is a large contingent of our co-religionists in the two branches of the service right now. They were at Vera Cruz, they were found on the Mexican border. What the Jews in Europe have done for their respective countries is too well known. It could not be indeed otherwise. Whether in countries free or in the Russia of pre-revolutionary days, our brethren acted as dutiful citizens should. They flocked to the colors as volunteers long before the summons of conscription came to them. They gave up their lives freely. They have been decorated for deeds of valor, nay for heroic exploits. We know ourselves as part and parcel of the American nation. Some of us are descended from ancestors who fought in the Revolutionary War. We stood by the flag in 1812. In the North and in the South we fought side by side with other Americans in the War of Secession. We took part in the Spanish War. There is not a heart that beats truer to America than the Jewish.

We have gone into this cruel business without hate or malice. We have gone into it beyond doubt for interests of our own. At Washington they know more than we do. We trust our executive and legislators. And we must see it that our objects are realized. The President seems to have an idea that out of this conflagration a better world will result. At any rate this will be a safer country to live in. It is true, it will be a changed land. Those that expected that disarmament would follow upon the conclusion of this war may find themselves disillusioned. We cannot take ourselves out of our wonted isolation too lightly. We shall have burdens to carry, and for a long time to come. Perhaps that the League of Nations for permanent peace will emerge. Even then we cannot expect to be a useful member unless we share in the responsibilities. As Jews we shall enter whole-heartedly into whatsoever is best for our country. When the war is over, differences of opinion will naturally manifest themselves. The old party lines may and may not be revived. But a democratic government needs, courts, invites criticism at every step. The hour is too solemn to indulge in prognostications. We give ourselves unstintingly to present tasks. These will call for the highest that is in us. We Jews shall enter the ranks for American interests. We have no others. Still as Jews we may venture to express the opinion that the United States, now a partner to the struggle, now sure of a voice in the peace negotiations that will sooner or later come, will find an opportunity to sponsor the cause of the Jew wheresoever he is still the subject of exceptional laws. For we know not whether conditions in Russia will be stable. We hope they will. There are other lands in which the Jew is still to come into his own. Even in the free countries his sacrifices entitle him to greater consideration, and much that is withheld from him should be granted him. If Palestine can be turned over to Jews to settle there peacefully and to develop its resources, the project ought to receive the attention due it. From past experiences we know how solicitous our government has always been for righting the cause of the hapless Jew. And another word, not on behalf of the Jew, but to the Jew. There is no occasion for spectacular patriotism. There is no call for specific Jewish regiments. Patriotism is a civic duty, sanctioned, of course, by religion. We are not a distinct civic body here or elsewhere. We join as individuals, we join as Americans. And still another word to any organization that may take it up. Keep count. See to it that the names of all Jews taking up arms be perpetuated. Not that we expect to be patted on our back for a duty which is ours to perform ungrudgingly, lovingly, but in order that the "impression" referred to above may forever be done away with. Other than these very pardonable Jewish interests we have none. Our supreme desire is to be helpful in our country and to see it victorious without crushing the enemy, righteous in all its undertakings, humanitarian in the midst of carnage, never oblivious of its high destiny to act as the restorer of civilization and the apostle of freedom.

A HIGHLY IMPORTANT AND ILLUMINATING DOCUMENT.

In another part of this issue the readers will find the text of a circular letter addressed by Mr. Louis Marshall in his capacity as president of the American Jewish Committee to subscribers and to others, with a view of stimulating anew the generous inclinations to help the committee carry on its activities.

In these war-ridden times, when history is made and not written, the danger is great that men forget who the actors are and were behind the [illegible] document sent out by Mr. Marshall [illegible] for this very reason, of the greatest importance. It is apparently purposed and worded not with the mere view of soliciting subscriptions. It serves as clearly the intention to expose for contemporary and to preserve for posterity the record of the part Mr. Marshall and his committee had in preparing the way for the liberation of Russia from the burdensome yoke of autocracy and Czarism.

Had we not been fortunate enough to have received through one of our members the appealing epistle we should have continued in dense ignorance. For candidly be our shortcoming confessed we have labored under the erroneous impression that other bodies also had taken a prominent part in the agitation to secure the renunciation of the treaty of amity and commerce with Imperial Russia. The first step toward this goal was taken at a meeting of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. A committee was there appointed to submit certain resolutions to the President of the United States. Some time afterwards, the President, after consulting with Mr. Simon Wolf as representative at Washington of the Congregations and B'nai B'rith, invited to luncheon and conference three representatives of said organizations and also a like number of the American Jewish Committee. The luncheon was a success, but instead of a conference the guests listened to a decision. Immediately upon returning to the Hotel from the White House, Messrs. Schiff, Marshall and Kraus conferred. A decision was arrived at to appeal to the people of the country. Mr. Schiff, who is a member of all of said three organizations, took the lead. The result of the appeal is recent history. It was felt in the White House as well as in Congress. When the question was pending in Congress, Messrs. Simon Wolf and Adolf Kraus again paid a visit to the White House and after a short conference the President told them that about Christmas time he would give notice to the Russian Government that the treaty would be abrogated. The B'nai B'rith were active in the appeal to the people of the country and this was recognized by President Taft by sending to the Executive Committee of the Order through the Secretary of Commerce and Labor Mr. Nagel, the pen with which the President signed the notice of the abrogation of the treaty.

Of all this, the self-praising circular of the President of the American Committee maintains a dignified silence. It can be said of him that whatever he undertakes to do is always done in a very dignified manner, which surely must appeal to those who deem manner to be more essential than matter, for if one should happen to be long on matter he can afford to be short on manner, but if short on matter he can make up by being long on manner. The letter before us marked by suavity of tone which none commands to so high a degree as the distinguished gentleman whose name appears thereon in autographic reproduction.

The historian will have good cause to rejoice that Mr. Marshall was moved to reveal the truth about the abrogation of the treaty with Russia. Perish the doubt that he may be in error. If some of us will refuse to accept the statements and claims contained in the circular in a submissive mood—what of it? The power of the Romanoffs is broken. Is that not sufficient to justify any claim?

The doom of autocracy is at hand. But then autocracy, like heresy, is a very flexible term. Democracy is supposed to speak through chosen representatives. Under date of Feb. 9, 1916, Cardinal Gasparri wrote from the Vatican to Mr. Marshall and his committee in part as follows:

"The Supreme Pontiff has, with interest, taken notice of the letter bearing date December 30, 1915, which you have been pleased to address to him in the name of the three million Jewish citizens of the United States of America."

We are fortunate in at last having a Jewish organization chosen on democratic principles, for Mr. Marshall's Committee speaks on behalf of three million American Jews, which means all, if not more than all of American Jewry.

It is known that the page displaying the Divine Name was regarded by ancient Israel as too sacred to be thoughtlessly destroyed or to be left to the chance mercies of the refuse heap and the whims of the winds in the streets. Tenderly and reverently every book handwritten or printed in which possibly the name of the Godhead might be contained was laid away in the garret of synagogue and the like. Such tender treatment should also be given to Mr. Louis Marshall's circular. We hope that document will pass to posterity in more than one copy or locality. A close study of its phraseology discloses who should be given the credit for the revolution which freed the Russian people. According to Mr. Marshall, the American Jewish Committee brought about this most glorious upturn. Let small minded scribblers continue to reason that diplomatic intrigue utilized the spreading bread riots to encompass the dethronement of the Romanoff Dynasty distrusted of readiness to make peace with the Central Powers. Let others contend that a victorious Czar never could have been deposed and that therefore in the last analysis the hostile armies should be acclaimed the liberators of Russia. None of these factors may be adduced. The American Jewish Committee, according to Mr. Marshall, prepared for the castastrophical downfall of Nicholas the Second when it lead the United States to abrogate the treaty.

Such foresight, such achievements, are truly marvelous, and therefore we admonish our readers to treat Mr. Marshall's circular tenderly and reverently.

JOSEPH LEONARD LEVY.

The untimely passing of Rabbi Joseph Leonard Levy in the prime of his life, deprives Judaism of one of its most powerful teachers and advocates. Of tireless energy, remarkable vision, wonderful executive ability and magnetic personality, Dr. Levy has left his indelible mark on Judaism, both in his home city, Pittsburgh, and also in America. He had traveled more than any Rabbi in the country and his death becomes a national loss to Jewry.

His was an intensely Jewish soul. No matter what he undertook, he was always emphasizing the Jewish aspect. If he became an advocate of Peace, he was ever stressing the Jewish contribution, both in Bible days and now, to the furtherance of peaceful settlements, both as opposed to war and industrial strikes. If he advocated Widows' Pensions, it was because this measure was a modern application of the plea for justice so strongly emphasized by the Prophets of Israel. If he organized Synagogue Extension work, it was because he was thoroughly convinced that Judaism, to be potent, in the future requires an educated Jewry. He pleaded for civic righteousness, insisting that the Jew must be better than his neighbor, and thus return blessing to the country which shelters and protects us. If he wrote an interdenominational Thanksgiving service, it was to demonstrate the true catholicity of the religion of Israel. Dr. Levy was no assimilationist. Never did he surrender a Jewish principle to Christian favor. Time and again he threw himself, often unaided, against the bigotry of Evangelical preachers and silenced their malicious attack on Judaism.

Within the household of Israel, Doctor Levy was thoroughly liberal. While devoted to the cause of Reform Judaism, he was most sympathetic to those who held other views. Time and again he said that the religious observances of his parents were dear to him, though he no longer accepted their binding force. Lashing the hypocrite, the backslider and the renegade, he gave himself without measure, to every Jewish constructive work. Unable to subscribe to political Zionism, he supported Palestine Welfare work most generously.

Judaism will be much the poorer for his translation. We can ill afford to lose fearless and devoted workers in the vineyard of Israel. God grant that his mourners obtain consolation in the contemplation of his well ordered life. Cut down in the very prime of his career, after sixteen years of wonderful achievement in Pittsburgh, he has been gathered to his fathers. Joseph Leonard Levy has left a void not soon to be filled.

MR. FRED LAZARUS.

Mr. Fred Lazarus, of Columbus, Ohio, prominent in public life, has passed away. He was born in Germany in 1850 and was brought, when one year old, to this country by his parents, and has lived in Columbus ever since.

Mr. Lazarus became affiliated with many public activities and with a large number of business institutions. He was greatly interested in philanthropic and humanitarian work and took an active interest in the work of the Columbus Humane Society, the Children's Hospital, the Associated Charities and other kindred institutions. He also was active in fraternal circles, being a life member of the Elks, a thirty-second degree Mason, and Past President of Zion Lodge of the B'nai B'rith. Jewish charities and philanthropies were most dear to him. He was president of the Montefiore Home for Aged and Infirm at Cleveland, trustee and treasurer of the Jewish Orphan Asylum at Cleveland, and director of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs.

Mr. Lazarus' private life and his public work exemplified high moral standards. Unassuming in his personality and endowed with lovable qualities, he became the friend not only of those with whom he was associated, but of those also who came in contact with his generous nature. The B'nai B'rith mourn with his family the passing of a noble leader.

JACOB FURTH HONORED.

On Wednesday evening, March 28, 1917, Mr. Jacob Furth of St. Louis, a member of the Executive Committee and Treasurer of the Order, was presented by the B'nai B'rith lodges of St. Louis with a beautiful silver Menorah. The gift was a post-festum reminiscence of Mr. Furth's seventieth birthday celebration, at which time the Menorah was to have been presented, but owing to the war the Bezalel Arts and Crafts School in Jerusalem was prevented from completing it at the expected time.

A public reception was tendered to the President of the District, Brother Joseph Rosenzweig, on Monday evening, April 23, 1917, in the B'nai B'rith Building, New York. There was a class of 40 candidates initiated, among them a number of prominent New York co-religionists such as Mr. Nathan Straus. Dr. Stephen S. Wise, who was also to be initiated, was unavoidably prevented from attending. The meeting was presided over by Brother Myer L. Victorius, Chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee. Among those who addressed the meeting were Brother Rev. Dr. Maurice H. Harris, Brother Joseph Rosenzweig, the guest of honor, and Brother Frederick Jay, President of District No. 3. The brothers who conducted the initiation ceremony were David Kraus, Harry Silverstein, William Asher, Charles Katzenstein, Lester Brucks, J. Goldberger and Isaac L. Elias.

Joy is a sacred flame that must be fed and that throws a splendid radiance over life. So to order one's life as to keep amid toils and sufferings the faculty of happiness and be able to propagate it in a sort of salutary contagion among one's fellow-men, is to do a work of fraternity in the noblest sense.—Charles Wagner.

MASSACRE OF JEWS IN PALESTINE FEARED.

Mr. Adolf Kraus, President of the Order, received the following cablegram from the President of the London B'nai B'rith Lodge:

"London, May 4.—President B'nai B'rith, 1228 Tribune Bldg., Chicago: Well authenticated report Jewish Massacre threatened Palestine. Can you intervene through foreign lodges or otherwise?—Gilbert, President".

Immediately upon receipt of same Mr. Kraus telegraphed (in the absence of Simon Wolf who, on account of his health, is sojourning in Goldsboro, N. C.) to Julius I. Peyser of Washington, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 5, as follows:

"Have received cable from London Lodge that there is well authenticated report that Jewish massacre is threatened in Palestine. Request State Department arrange for delivery of following cable to S. E. Trier Vestre Boulevard, 49 Copenhagen, or Dr. Martin Bloch Bahnhofstrasse 82 Zurich: 'Please wire Dr. Berthold Timendorfer, Berlin, also Professor Sol Ehrmann, Vienna, it is reported in America that Jews in Palestine will be massacred. Petition government to call attention of Turkish government to report. Kraus'. Kindly request our State Department to aid us in having messages promptly forwarded and if possible send messages in my name to Timendorfer and Ehrmann direct by wireless as valuable time may thereby be saved.—Adolf Kraus".

On Monday Mr. Kraus received telegraphic information from Washington that the cablegrams to the B'nai B'rith Grand Lodges in Europe had been transmitted by the State Department.

Mr. Kraus on behalf of the Executive Committee of the Order transmitted through the State Department in Washington 15,000 francs for immediate relief of the Palestinian refugees.

A TESTIMONIAL DINNER FOR RABBI EUGENE MANNHEIMER.

On Monday, March 26, Des Moines Lodge No. 330, of Des Moines, Ia., gave a banquet and dance in honor of Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer and his fiancee, Miss Irma Shloss, at the Masonic Temple Hall. Covers were spread for 220 guests. The affair was a brilliant success, in fact the most successful function of its kind ever held in Des Moines. A six-course dinner, prepared by a committee of representative Jewish women in strict accord with the Jewish dietary laws, was served. After the banquet the president of the lodge, Mr. Meyer Silberman, introduced Mr. Dave Oransky as toastmaster. Toasts were offered by Messrs. J. B. Blum, Joseph Brody, Mose Marks, Mrs. Weinstock and Rabbi H. M. Cohen. Rabbi Mannheimer then responded briefly and indicated his appreciation of the courtesy shown him by the lodge.

Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer has been very zealous in his work in B'nai B'rith circles not only locally but also in District No. 6, he being a member of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge. In the local lodge he has been the guiding spirit for a number of years and has taken a leading part in all its activities. Through his endeavors two new lodges were added recently, one at Ottumwa, Ia., and one at Cedar Rapids, Ia.

Des Moines Lodge has shown marked activity and has doubled its membership within the last eighteen months, due to the enthusiasm on the part of the younger element led by Bro. Mannheimer. The meetings are well attended and the programs are made very interesting. Another campaign for members is planned for the near future.

MARKS NATHAN JEWISH ORPHAN HOME.

A Farewell Reception and Dinner was tendered by the Directors of the Marks Nathan Jewish Orphan Home of Chicago, on Thursday evening, May 3, 1917, to Mr. Louis Greenberg, who was recently elected Superintendent of the Jewish Orphanage and Aid of Western Canada in Winnipeg, an institution fostered and supported by the B'nai B'rith of Canada. Mr. Greenberg, who is himself a product of an Orphan Home, was Assistant Superintendent of the Marks Nathan Jewish Orphan Home for the last three and one-half years. Mr. Chas. I. Herron, President, and Mr. E. L. Trotzkey, Superintendent of the Home, and many other members of the Board, spoke enthusiastically of the good services rendered by Mr. Greenberg, and expressed the hope for his continued success in his new sphere of activity. An illuminated address from the Board of Directors and a loving cup from the children were presented to Mr. Greenberg in appreciation of his work and as a token of the esteem in which he is held by all concerned.

American Jewish Relief Committee Calls National Emergency Conference

Dinner by Mr. Jacob H. Schiff

Several hundred of the most prominent Jews in the United States were the guests of Jacob H. Schiff at a dinner on April 15, at the Hotel Savoy, New York. Among them were delegates from all over the country to a National Emergency Conference held on the same day by the American Jewish Relief Committee to map out its campaign to raise $10,000,000 for relief of Jewish war victims during this year. Appeals for support for this campaign were made at the dinner, and before it was over pledges and cash contributions amounting to more than $2,500,000 had been made.

Among those who appealed for aid on a larger scale than has been made before during the war were Julius Rosenwald; former Ambassador Henry Morgenthau, Mr. Schiff and Felix M. Warburg. Many wrote out pledges of large personal contributions while the speeches were in progress, others from out of town brought announcements of pledges from Jews in their cities, amounting in all, to more than $1,000,000. As a result, nearly a third of the desired $10,000,000 had been reached, for to the $2,500,000 in pledges and contributions is to be added a contribution from Mr. Rosenwald ot "one-tenth of the entire amount raised by Nov. 1, 1917, in the United States."

Already, during the two and a half years of the war, $8,000,000 has been sent to Europe for Jewish relief. This announcement was made at the emergency conference of the Treasurer of the Joint Distribution Committee. Despite the fact that the amount which the American Jewish Relief Committee has set about to raise in one year is greater than the total amount sent during the three previous years, all the speakers expressed confidence that it would be reached.

Mr. Schiff announced that his contribution would be $100,000 and that its special purpose would be to establish a hospital unit in Russia in recognition of the emancipation of the Jew, won through the Russian revolution. He said that many Jewish surgeons had already volunteered to go to the front with the hospital unit.

Nathan Straus contributed $50,000. [illegible] A. Wimpfheimer and Julius [illegible]ach contributed $25,000; Samuel [illegible]er and James Speyer, $10,000 each; H. P. Goldschmidt, $5,000; Judge Leon Saunders pledged $25,000 and said it would be "possibly $50,000," on behalf of the Independent Order B'rith Abraham. It was announced that pledges amounting to $1,000,000 were brought in by delegates from other cities to the emergency conference.

It was announced that "Table 8" pledged itself to raise $1,000,000. At "Table 8" were twelve persons: Felix Gould, Joseph H. Cohen, Harry Bronner, William Fischman, S. I. Hyman, S. C. Lamport, J. L. Phillips, A. E. Rothstein, R. Sadowsky, Bernard Semel, Julius Swartz and Max Weinstein.

Mr. Warburg contributed $25,000, Leo Bamberger of Newark $10,000, Robert H. Lehman $10,000, and smaller contributions amounted to $150,000. Adolph S. Ochs promised 10 per cent of the amounts contributed in Tennessee. Governor Simon Bamberger of Utah, Governor Moses Alexander of Idaho, and Ben Selling of Oregon made similar pledges for those states. A large number pledged to contribute 10 per cent of the total amounts raised in their home communities.

The speeches were marked by a patriotic note, and Mr. Schiff, who presided, started them by drinking a toast to the health of President Wilson. Mr. Morgenthau also put patriotism first, and said that "We, as Jews, must first of all think of ourselves as Americans."

Mr. Schiff said, in part:

"We all know the President has not lightly led the nation into war; we know of his struggles, of his patience, of his unfortunately futile endeavors to bring the warring governments together into a peace without victory; of his efforts to the last to prevent ourselves being drawn into the cauldron that gradually was consuming all Europe. But the moment at last came when we were no longer left with any choice, when we were confronted with but the alternative of whether or not America, the great democracy of modern times, should submit the sovereignty of its people to the dictates of a government built upon class supremacy and absolutism. Had we done so we would have contributed in a large measure to the extension of autocratic government and perhaps the gradual [illegible] of government 'by the people, [illegible] people for the people' among [illegible] of the earth, for the victory [illegible] in Europe could in time [illegible] no other result.

"And to us as American Jews it must be particularly gratifying that our country enters this momentous struggle for the liberation of the modern world from the possible rule of those who would make automatons of all over whom they might gain dominion, just at the moment when the great stronghold of autocracy —Russian Czardom—has succumbed to the onslaught of the people whom it had so long oppressed and deprived of the rights which should be the inborn possession of all mankind. As American Jews we are full of gratitude that Providence has placed our lot within this great nation, and that as part of it we can and shall willingly do our duty with our entire heart, with our entire soul, and with our entire possessions.

"The duty on our part becomes the greater now to do our utmost to assuage the hard fate of those, who, for almost three years, have been held in the grip of the indescribable distress and the horrors the war has produced. Even the hardships of the greatly to be pitied Belgians, undeserved and sad as these hardships no doubt are, are probably not as great as the cruel sufferings to which several millions of our co-religionists in the war zones have been subjected, and from which they cannot be freed unless American Jewry furnishes the means for the rescue of these great numbers of men, women, children, who are of our flesh and blood, and whom we, whom Providence has blessed so greatly, dare not permit to perish.

"And does not our duty become even greater, now that the gates have been opened to Russian Jewry for entering upon the undiminished enjoyment of the happiness of life—attainable alone where human rights are accorded to all alike—to make it possible that these broken-down brothers of ours shall be helped to a recovery of their health and their existence, not to speak of the large requirements for aid to our co-religionists in Palestine, in Poland, in Galicia, in Rumania, in Bulgaria, and in other lands involved in the war.

"I feel that the Jews of America have a serious duty that they cannot evade," Mr. Rosenwald said. "These starving men and women and children must depend on us to do for them what we would expect them to do for us were the conditions reversed. We have been successful as we view success, but there are hundreds of thousands who have worked harder than we have and have been just as able, but it has been ours to have the opportunity that they lacked. And now it is our opportunity to aid them. We have had the good luck to live in this free country, the United States, and it is our duty to help those whose cradles happened to be rocked in Russia instead of here. They are no more to blame for their condition than our children would be if they were similarly situated. What we must do is to bring it home to the Jews of this country that it is our duty to aid the Jews of Europe".

Felix M. Warburg, Chairman of the Joint Distribution Committee, said that the greatest duty of the Jew in this country to day was toward the United States. He said that, as he saw it, the country's problem was three-fold: military preparedness, industrial preparedness, and agricultural preparedness. He said:

"We are all, I know, in absolute accord with our President in his advocacy of military preparedness. Your friends and mine have in many instances already enlisted for active service. Numbers of our friends and relatives have been training for the last two years in Government and college military training camps.

"As regards industrial preparedness—our financial and commercial leaders can be of tremendous value to our Government in a program for the conservation of our industrial resources. We have in our midst one such, Julius Rosenwald, of whose achievements and of whose heart and brain you know.

"As regards agricultural preparedness, I have in mind the possibility of working along lines which shall make it possible for the realization of the hope that every bit of untilled land in this country will be made productive.

"(a) A program for production which shall utilize as sub-military agents those persons who because of the present rigid military requirements have not been able to enter the army and navy. Such people can render a vast service which should be recognized as a quasi military service; in many instances through their very toll under conditions which make for greater health and strength, they will become more fit for military duty at a later time should they then be needed.

"(b) For co-ordination of agricultural work between cities and States, between States and the Federal Government.

"(c) For distribution by some sort of Government system which will as much as possible standardize prices and equalize outputs".

Other speakers emphasized the need of reaching a larger number of the Jews in this country with the appeals for aid, and it was announced that the conference would take a census of all the Jews in the United States and divide the country in seven districts, of which New York and Chicago would each constitute one district. There is to be a Chairman for each district and for each city. The local committee of each State is to campaign for a stipulated amount assessed to each State. New York's assessment was the biggest, being $4,000,000. Illinois and Pennsylvania came next, with assessments of $1,000,000 each.

The assessments, as prepared by the Apportionment Committee, were:

Alabama	$700,000	Nebraska	$ 55,000
Arizona	4,000	Nevada	10,000
Arkansas	20,000	N. Hampshire	12,000
California	700,000	New Jersey	400,000
Colorado	70,000	New Mexico	5,000

Delaware	18,000	N. Carolina	50,000
Dist. of Col.	80,000	N. Dakota	25,000
Florida	30,000	Ohio	750,000
Georgia	100,000	Oklahoma	50,000
Idaho	10,000	Oregon	70,000
Illinois	1,000,000	Penn.	1,000,000
Indiana	150,000	Rhode Island	100,000
Iowa	125,000	S. Carolina	35,000
Kansas	30,000	S. Dakota	5,000

Mississippi	125,000	Wisconsin	150,000
Missouri	300,000	Wyoming	25,000
Montana	15,000

At the afternoon session of the conference Mr. Lehman, Secretary of the Joint Board of Distribution, made a report on the funds already distributed for Jewish relief, which showed with what economy the funds have been handled. He reported that less than 1 per cent of the entire amount collected had been paid out for expenses.

Mr. Morgenthau frankly scored New York as the "weakest point" in the campaign. He said he was not given to "scolding" but that he felt it was sometimes necessary to arouse persons from their lethargy.

"Our weakest spot is New York," he said: 'The reason is that we are steeped in materialism here, and surrounded by an atmosphere of selfishness. I hope that these reports from outside about the contributions that are being made in other parts of the country that are not so rich will serve to arouse us to our duty".

Mr. Straus aroused great enthusiasm with his announcement of a $50,000 contribution. He said that in comparison with his earthly possessions he believed he was putting up more than any other Jew in the United States, and Mr. Schiff quickly seconded this statement and said that he realized that Mr. Straus was depriving himself of many comforts to make the gift.

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE.

356 Second Avenue, New York,
April 26, 1917.

Dear Sir: The American Jewish Committee greeted with joy the success of the recent revolution in Russia. One of our leading members said:

"The fall of the Romanoff dynasty and the creation of a free government in Russia amply justify the labors of the American Jewish Committee in making known to the world the terrible conditions under which our co-religionists in Russia were obliged to exist and the successful effort made with Congress and the people which brought about the abrogation of the treaty of friendship and commerce between the United States and Russia which resulted from these labors".

The work of the Committee in this and other directions during 1916 is fully described in the Tenth Annual Report, copy of which we are sending you under separate cover.

Mr. Louis Wolsley, of Cleveland, Ohio, has been appointed by the mayor as a member of the Committee of Representative Citizens for National Defense.

Hon. Ben Selling, of Portland, has been appointed member of the Committee on "Law Reform" by the Governor.

Judge Jos. Oberfelder, of Sidney, Nebraska, was elected State Counsel of the Modern Woodmen of America for the State of Nebraska. Judge Oberfelder is also United States Commissioner for the State of Nebraska.

PROMOTION OF SABBATH SCHOOL WORK.

At an enthusiastic meeting held by the Jewish citizens of Cross, St. Francis and Lee counties in Mariana, Ark., on Sunday, March 25, 1917, the Tri-Cities Jewish League was organized. The purpose of the new organization will be to hold services alternately in Wynne, Forest City and Mariana in order that the Sabbath school work may be conducted and promoted among the Jewish people under the direction of Rabbi P. W. Jacobs, of Helena, Ark. Officers and a board of managers were elected. The perfection of this organization is, in a large measure, due to the influence of Fort Smith Lodge No. 306, of Fort Smith, Ark., and to the untiring efforts of its leader, Brother L. Barnett, who has always taken an active part in the religious and fraternal affairs of the city.

JEWISH STATISTICS IN ITALY.

According to official statistics, the number of Jewish illiterates in Italy is much smaller than that of non-Jews. Among non-Jews, forty-two in every hundred men cannot sign their names, and fifty-even in every hundred women are illiterate; whereas among Jews only three men and seven women in every hundred are unable to do so. It is an interesting fact that there are fewer Jewish females than males in Italy.

The Forty-fourth Convention of District No. 7, I. O. B. B.

In the presence of 137 delegates and about sixty visitors the forty-fourth annual convention of District No. 7, I. O B. B., opened at 11 o'clock Sunday morning, April 22, at Chattanooga, Tenn. The session was opened by Ernest R. Bernstein, President of the District, who, during that session and all subsequent sessions of the convention, showed such remarkable tact and patience in governing the Grand Lodge as to earn appreciative comment and hearty commendation. Patriotism played a prominent part in the exercises, the delegates standing in the flag-draped convention hall and singing "America" before the welcome addresses were given.

Greetings from Mayor Littleton on behalf of the city, Rabbi Julian Miller and Harry Wise for the Jews of the city, and Herbert Oppenheim, President of the Chattanooga Lodge, were given.

Officers of the Grand Lodge, with local officers, the Mayor and Rabbi Miller, occupied seats on the stage. Salomon Marx, of New Orleans, the oldest member of the Order, having joined sixty-one years ago, was invited to a place on the rostrum, and introdured to the convention and was accorded an ovation.

Mayor Littleton lauded the Jews for the intelligence and energy shown by them in the development of America. He said there was no doubt or fear as to where the American Jew would stand in the present crisis. "They are foremost in literature, foremost in the professions, foremost in commerce and foremost in everything their people have undertaken," he said. "Especially is this true of the B'nai B'rith, which is foremost in philanthropy. The Jew represents the best blood of the nation and the world. We are glad to have you here."

Harry Wise and Herbert Oppenheim made happy speeches bespeaking the welcome extended the delegates and visitors. Rabbi Miller was master of ceremonies and Rabbi Joseph Blatt, of Oklahoma City, offered the invocation.

The preliminary part of the convention over, Brother Bernstein read his presidential message, which was received with loud and long applause and referred to a special committee for a report.

No sooner had the applause accorded the president's message subsided, when Dr. Louis Abramson, of Shreveport, La., asked for the privilege of the floor, and, in feeling words of friendship, presented on behalf of Louisiana Lodge 107, of Shreveport, a large and beautiful silver loving cup, suitably engraved, to Mr. Bernstein, who accepted the token of love and affection with modesty and appreciation.

Brother Myron M. Goldman then presented his report as Secretary, from which it was apparent that the District is in excellent condition, both as to finances and as to numerical strength.

Committee Reports.

The Committee on the Orphans' Home presented a report which contained valuable instructions and recommendations.

It recommends the appointment of a representative member in each community in which a Lodge exists whose duty should be to further the causes that look to the benefit of the Home and to him should be made all appeals of whatever character.

Touro Infirmary.

The report of the Committee on this institution chronicles in a summary manner its extensive activities and mentions their recognitions by extraordinary donations from several philanthropists.

Mrs. Henry Newman gave $50,000 for the erection of a new Maternity Hospital.

Mrs. Jacob K. Newman gave about $65,000 towards the erection of a suitable building for the clinics, towards which object Mr. E. W. Mente (not a Jew), also gave $50,000, and Mr. E. V. Benjamin, the President of the Touro, contributed $10,000.

The Committee calls attention to the fact that "these large donations, providing for the erection of additional buildings, carry with them corresponding obligations and responsibilities".

Social Service Committee.

Rabbi Emil W. Leipziger, Chairman, presented a report full of much valuable information. He stated that he has occupied this position for only a portion of the term, having been appointed in the early Fall to fill a vacancy occurring owing to the removal of Rabbi Emanuel Sternheim, who was made Chairman, from the District.

He found that Rabbi Sternheim had expended 80 per cent of the appropriation, hence his own activities were necessarily very much curtailed. He presented in detail the valuable activities of the Committee and suggested much work for the future.

He endeavored to obtain statistics of the inmates of penal and eleemosynary institutions in the District and what percentage of the inmates consists of Jews. He was unable to obtain information from Florida and Mississippi in regard to penal institutions, but in the other six states of the District he found 9,232 inmates of whom 19 are of the Jewish faith, only one-fifth of one per cent. In eleemosynary institutions of various kinds he notes that among 12,070 inmates one hundred are Jewish, a percentage of four-fifths of one per cent.

The Committee made a special report on the resolution introduced by Past Grand President A. A. Marxs in the convention of 1916, recommending an appropriation of $5,000, or as much thereof as is necessary to subsidize surviving parents of half-orphans, so that in many cases these children can be kept in their own homes.

The Committee conferred with the Board of Managers of the Home and came to the following conclusions:

When we consider that this body of men have been in some instances adopting the principle involved in regard to New Orleans cases, where they can command the co-operation of the New Orleans Federation and its trained workers, and yet did not care to go on record with a judgment either for or against the proposition, it seems to me that it would be unwise for this convention to proceed with this new movement and to make an appropriation for it until its details have been carefully worked out.

It concludes, we, therefore, recommend that a commission of five be appointed, of which the Social Service Chairman shall be one, whose duty it shall be to present to the next convention a tentative yet practical plan upon the basis of which the new work can be organized.

Agricultural Committee.

This Committee made numerous recommendations among which are that 10,000 or more acres of land be purchased.

That on the site thus secured a town be established in which the settlers are to live thus combining farming with the social amenities of communal life.

The money needed is to be supplied by a stock company capitalized at $1,000,000. Lands are to be sold to Jewish farmers only on terms of easy payments.

Payments on stock are also to extend over a number of years and none to be made until $250,000 has been subscribed.

The Committee states that it will be able to show subscriptions to the amount of $50,000 and states that if it had been permitted to work more actively its subscriptions would have reached $150,000, "but, for reasons not entirely revealed to them, they were cautioned to proceed slowly, or, rather, to wait with the active campaign until the convention of 1917 shall have taken place".

Leo N. Levi Sinking Fund.

Receipts were $4,633.32 and the disbursements amounted to $4,580.17, leaving a balance of $53.15. The total number of debentures issued is 200, amounting to 20,000. Of these thirty-seven have been paid, twenty have been called payable June 1, on one payment has been stopped, it having been lost, leaving 142 outstanding, amounting to $14,200. Interest is being paid as it becomes due.

Brother Goldman was followed by Charles F. Moritz, of Montgomery, Ala., who, on behalf of the Endowment Committee of which he is Chairman, presented a report showing exact status of the Endowment Fund of the District.

An announcement from the chair of the various convention committees brought the first session to a close at 1:45 P. M.

There was no session in the afternoon, as a visit to Lookout Mountain had been arranged for the delegates and visitors at that time. A highly interesting and instructive meeting took place, however, in the evening, which was given over to a public gathering at one of the theaters and which was attended by over six hundred people. That meeting was held under the auspices of the Cultural Advancement Committee of the District and was presided over by Joseph Hirsh of Vicksburg, Miss., who delivered a short opening address and, with his characteristic wit and good-natured humor, introduced the various numbers on the program which was participated in by Dr. C. A. Garratt at the piano, Lester Cohn, violinist, with Mrs. Robert Schwartz, accompanist; Mrs. Adolph Shumacker, soloist, and Mrs. A. B. Freyer, violinist.

The speaker of the evening was Judge David B. Samuels, of Shreveport, who, after a beautifully worded prayer by Rabbi B. C. Ehrenreich, of Montgomery, delivered an inspiring and eloquent address in which he said in part as follows:

"Now is the reign of common people, the era of the common man, of democratic freedom and a closer alliance between all civil countries,. No more sacred principles have been handed down by God to man than those we cherish in the B'nai B'rith. It is a great order, with great achievements. Now, I can see the farm city an actuality; I can see great good being done through right living and right thinking. I can also see the American eagle on the crest of the flag a little ruffled—not ruffled in anger—but just a little peeved because some of our socialist principles are about to be invaded".

"When the history of humanity will again be told in beautiful passages, Israel's name will be mentioned as doing much. When a regenerated nation in all her united strength seeks to shake off the shackles, Israel will be mentioned in the triumphant song.

"The wickedness of the world, caused God once to destroy it that it might be rebuilt again. Now the world does not need to be destroyed, but systems need to be destroyed. Whenever the nation says the voice of the people is not the voice of God, then comes the heavy hand and puts them in oblivion".

Monday, April 23.

The convention was called to order at 10 A. M., and opened with prayer by Rabbi Mendel Silber.

Much of the time during the morning session was taken up with the reading of resolutions which, in conformity with a rule previously adopted, were referred to the Distribution Committee without discussion.

Many messages from Lodges, Grand Lodges and individuals were also read during the session, and messages of condolence were ordered sent to the families of Leo N. Levi and Nat Strauss and a message of cheer to Capt. Leon Schwartz.

The reading of the report on Social Service by Rabbi Emil W. Liepziger, Chairman of the Committee on Social Service, followed and was enthusiastically received.

At 12:30 Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Director of the Social Service Department, was presented and delivered an eloquent address in which he outlined the work of his department and reviewed the various activities fostered by the Order in the line of social service.

"The Social Service Department, formed two years ago, is the largest organization doing volunteer Jewish work in America", he stated. "Every Jew who comes out of prison is being taken care of. There are few Jews in state prisons. When a man is released from prison we secure a position for him and there is a friend who acts as a big brother to him.

"When a Jewish boy is brought before the court the B'nai B'rith Social Service Committee shall step in and seek to have him paroled to a big brother. There are fifty-two big brothers in Chicago, and each one is taking care of a lad who otherwise might be in the reform school today".

After Dr. Coffee had finished speaking, Sig. Livingston, of Bloomington, Ill., the head of the Anti-Defamation League, was introduced and in a most eloquent address, which constantly called forth loud applause, he depicted the conditions that gave rise to the Anti-Defamation League and described its development and manifold activities.

Such characters as "Shylock" in "The Merchant of Venice," and "Fagan" in 'Oliver Twist", have had a pernicious effect on young minds, Mr. Livingston said, and to counteract what he termed "the poison" of such literature, the League is making a nation-wide effort to have the reading of "The Merchant of Venice" eliminated from the public schools of the country unless the students are also allowed to read "Nathan, the Wise", by Lessing.

Children in early childhood have been impressed with an erroneous idea of Jewish character, he said, in an interview yesterday, by such rhymes from "Mother Goose" as:

Jack sold his egg to a rogue of a Jew,
Who cheated him out of half of his due.

The League is waging a vigorous campaign to eliminate this idea from the mind of the public and especially from the minds of children. As the chairman expresses it, "we want the coming generation to be open-minded concerning the Jew".

Mr. Livingston said that the idea existed that the Jew was a materialist and immersed in himself, when as a matter of fact colleges and universities of this country were crowded with Jews; they were represented in all the sciences. "Ask any child in your public schools who was the foremost Jew in literature", said Mr. Livingston, "and he will immediately answer, 'Shylock.' On the other hand, ask them who is the foremost Jew in scientific research, the foremost Jew philosopher or the foremost Jew writer, and they cannot tell you.

"Jews have been made the butt end of many unsavory jokes, ugly characterizations in moving pictures, on the stage and in literature. In doing this the lowest type of Jew and his idiosyncrasies have been exploited and the shortcomings of this type unless checked at once will indelibly stamp the race. We are combating these things by educational means by trying to show that calumny and defamation injure innocent people. Our pivotal idea is the demand that every Jew be judged as an individual by merit and demerit and the Jews today, as a whole, not be blamed by the misconduct of a few. We have malefactors, certainly, but we also lay claim to the average virtue of other people of other races and religions".

At 2 P. M. the convention adjourned and, at 3:30 P. M., the delegates and visitors were taken on a delightful sightseeing trip to Chickamauga Park, visiting the battlefields made memorable by the heroism of the thousands who had fought and fallen there in 1863.

In the meantime, the rabbis present at the convention were entertained at lunch by Rabbi Julian Miller, while the ladies accompanying the delegates were entertained by the Jewish women of the city. The latter proved a most delightful function.

The feature of the occasion was a talk by Mrs. E. R. Bernstein who, as though not to be outdone by her husband, spoke so beautifully as to make it clear that she could be, in the fullest sense, a true "helpmate" to the brilliant and popular president, Brother Ernest.

Mrs. Bernstein's talk follows:

"Ladies: When one has never had the experience of facing an audience the mere thought of talking seems easy, but this new sensation is now painfully embarrassing. Doubly so on account of my inability to fitly and fully express the appreciation and gratitude of the ladies who were the recipients of your many graceful attentions.

"Truly, you have exemplified in its deepest significance that which your eloquent Rabbi so beautifully pictured in the invitation he extended to the Little Rock Convention to meet here—and one does not have to draw too strongly on her imagination after viewing your lovely city and its surrounding country, so rich in history and natural beauty, to be reminded of a second promised land. But, aside from the sights which we have been permitted to witness through your charming hospitality and the festivities which your thoughtfulness occasioned is the greater pleasure of meeting and knowing you—and we leave taking with us fragrant memories of each and every one of you individually and collectively.

"'Tis said 'parting is such sweet sorrow,' and we look forward to a kind future which will permit us again to meet, if not all of you and all of us, at least some of you and some of us, when the friendships formed here can be strengthened and like pleasures which were afforded, renewed. In the name of the entire delegation, I thank you".

On Monday evening the delegates and visitors were entertained at a Dutch supper and dance, after which the rabbis had a reunion to an uncertain hour of the morning.

Tuesday, April 24.

There were two sessions on Tuesday. The morning session was opened with prayer by President Bernstein at 10 o'clock and, after a lengthy discussion, involving most of the business session Tuesday morning. The delegates, by unanimous vote, adopted the report of their Agricultural Committee recommending the establishment of a 200-family city farm somewhere in Texas. The project is to cost in the neighborhood of $1,000,000.

An independent corporation will be formed upon which will devolve the responsibility of soliciting the necessary funds for the farm. The B'nai B'rith assumes no financial obligation, but lends its support to the undertaking and indorses the report of the committee.

The resolution as originally introduced brought forth considerable discussion as to the needs or propriety of such an institution at this time. The change in the resolution merely changed the verbiage, and authorized the establishment of the separate corporation.

No debt or any other obligations are assumed by the Lodge.

J. K. Hexter, as Chairman of the Agricultural Committee, introduced the original resolution. He urged, in his preliminary remarks, the establishment of the work, stating that it would result in much good to the Jewish race.

Judge David B. Samuels, of Shreveport, and Charles Rosens, of New Orleans, in eloquent speeches, advised against the farm's establishment, saying that the isolation would serve to single Jewish inhabitants out as living in a strictly Jewish city. They both urged that seclusion be not practiced, but that they should keep their own hands clean and do nothing but what would be desired from the hands of others.

After much discussion of the matter the amendment to the original resolution was introduced by Ralph J. Schwartz of New Orleans. It had the indorsement of the entire membership of the Agricultural Committee, whereas the first one did not. One member refused to sign it on the original draft, but did on the second. The last resolution was adopted unanimously.

The morning session closed at 1 P. M. and at 3:30 P. M., when the delegates resumed their work an hour was set aside for Memorial Service. This service was opened with prayer by Rabbi Mendel Silber, and, after Rabbi I. Lewinthal, the Chairman of the Committee on Necrology, read a thoughtfully prepared report in which he paid a touching tribute to the members of the Order and other great and good men who departed during the year, E. R. Bernstein eulogized the late Isaac Barron, of Shreveport, and Nathan Cohn delivered a eulogy on Martin A. Marks, of Cleveland, Ohio. The service closed with Kaddish recited by Rabbi Mendel Silber.

The Memorial Service was followed with the consideration of resolutions and action upon a number of reports, among them being one on the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, which disclosed the [illegible] figures:

[illegible] patients in Hospital April	22
Number of patients admitted during the year	147
Number of patients treated during the year	169
Number of patients discharged during the year	145
Number of patients died during the year	3
Number of patients remaining in Hospital April 1, 1917	21
Number of patients admitted second time	7

The Convention adjourned at 5 P. M., when the delegates and visitors were taken to Signal Mountain where a rich repast, followed by a dance, had been prepared for them. That function, which earned the hearty appreciation of all present was graced with three toasts, responded to by E. R. Bernstein, Ralph J. Schwartz and Herbert Oppenheim, while Harry Wise acted as toastmaster.

Wednesday, April 25.

Wednesday was devoted exclusively to expediting the unfinished business of the Convention and opened with prayer by Rabbi I. Lewinthal.

Among the most important measures, emanating from the different committees, was the adoption of the following resolutions:

Relating to Jewish Orphans' Home.

To the Officers and Members of D. G. L., No. 7, I. O. B. B.

Brethren:

At your last convention you adopted the "Big Brother idea" in connection with our children who are discharged from the Home, and to my personal knowledge the work done and results accomplished effect credit on all connected with the movement.

If it is our duty to look after the welfare of the children after they leave the Home why not make it our duty to seek their welfare before they enter, and as far as in our power try and keep them in their real home under the same roof which shields their mother or father.

I believe all of you will readily admit that this should be done, and if so, then let us do "Justice" to the child by keeping it in the real home.

I want to state emphatically that I have no fault to find with our Orphan Asylum, nor the management, for I am [illegible] that they cope with the problem [illegible] caring the best they know how. Nor do I take the view that we [illegible] arily close the doors of all [illegible] institutions; but I do say that we are not doing "Justice" to the child [illegible] admitting him to our institutions in very large majority of cases.

This is not a new subject, and as far back as the year 1900 our lamented leader, Leo N. Levi, made an eloquent plea in behalf of the orphan child before the convention of District No. 7. It is true that his main plea was that the orphan children should be adopted by others, and while this would be possibly the ideal solution of the problem, we have neither made any headway nor have we ever endeavored to try out this scheme, and while we may have some doubt as to its practicability, I believe we should do our utmost to try.

The large majority of children admitted to "Our Home" are half orphans; in some cases the father of the family has been called to his eternal home. There are other cases where the father has deserted the family and a few cases where the mother has strayed from the right path, so that there can be no fixed rule to govern all cases.

It is my firm belief that in a large number of cases, instead of admitting the child to the Home, we should help the mother or father, as the case may be, to care for the child and contribute the necessary funds so as to enable them to be raised in the proper atmosphere.

A good many of you will doubtless say that this is a problem for each community to handle, and in some cases this will be true; but there are many cases which cannot be cared for by the local community, as they have not the funds to do so. If it is true that it is our duty to care for these children in "Our Institution", then it should be equally our duty to care for them in their respective communities. Take for example a case where the mother is the surviving parent, let us see that she received a monthly allowance that will enable her to properly care for her children, and if the community is not able to provide the money, let the money be furnished by the Grand Lodge; let the proper committee appoint a big brother to advise the little family and look after their welfare until the children are old enough to no longer need our assistance.

In the case where the father survives and his income is not sufficient to properly care for the children, why not help him to help himself, either with money, or advice, or both; let him secure proper quarters with some Jewish family where he and his children will have a home. Why not help the man or woman to keep together the family ties, to strengthen them, not to weaken, them, as we are doing by our present system, and in most cases shattering them beyond all possibility of repair. Help the mother and father so they can remember their obligations to their children, keep the children so they may know the pleasures of a real home, so they may know the blessings of the mother's or father's love during the days of childhood. Ask yourself what would you want done if the case was one that affected your loving wife and children or yourself. Would you want them to go to "Our Home", or would you want them kept with you or your loving helpmate if it was in any way possible to do so? Let your answer to this question be the beginning of a new and noble work for our district. Let D. G. L. No. 7 blaze the trail for others to follow by appointing a committee to take charge of this movement, said committee to be authorized to begin active work just as soon as possible, and let the Grand Lodge appropriate $5,000, or as much thereof as may be needed, to enable the committee to do justice to our children, not charity.

Trusting that you will do the needful.
Submitted in B. B. L. & H.

Fraternally yours,
(Signed) Archibald A. Marx.

This resolution had been submitted at the Little Rock convention last year and was deferred until this year for investigation and action and has now been adopted in theory and indorsed in principle, but again deferred to the next convention for final action.

Relating to Old Folks' Home.

Resolved, That the District Grand Lodge authorize the O. F. H. committee to take up in their respective communities, or anywhere within the territory of the Order, I. O. B. B. subscriptions, donations, endowments or pledges looking to the establishment of a permanent fund for the erection and maintenance of an Old Folks' Home, to be located in the most favorable place in District No. 7; also to send letters to the surviving members of the endowment and ascertain who will be willing to bequeath all their rights, title and interest in and to the Endowment Fund as a perpetual memorial and monument to their philanthropy.

Signed
MENDEL SILBER.
C. F. MORITZ.

Relating to Propaganda.

Resolved, That the excellent article by Bro. Mendel Silber recently published in The Jewish Ledger under the title "The B'nai B'rith Way of Solving the Jewish Problem", should be read by all our members, and we recommend that a sufficient number of copies be printed at the expense of the Grand Lodge and distributed among the constituent lodges throughout the district.

Signed,
The Cultural Advancement Committee.

Election of officers and the selection of a meeting place for next year's convention closed the first session at 2 p. m.

Ralph J. Schwartz, who acted in the capacity of first vice-president during the year just closed, was selected president of the Order by unanimous vote. Sol Schoenmann, who was second vice-president, was advanced to first vice, and the second vice-president's position was filled by the selection of A. Leo Oberdorfer, who during this convention acted as sergeant-at-arms.

Secretary M. M. Goldman and Treasurer Archibald A. Marx were re-elected to the position they filled last year.

The fight for the 1918 convention city was spirited from the very beginning. Only two cities made application for the place, Oklahoma City and Houston. Delegates from both cities told the claims they had for the meeting, and Houston claimed that it had been promised them last year. Placing the name of Houston in position for selection was N. Hurwitz. A. D. Engleman presented the claim of Oklahoma City. After lengthy discussion the selection by Houston was made by a vote of 76 to 54.

The reports of different committees comprised the routine business which took until 2 o'clock. The business was largely technical, but hot discussions arose over several points brought up.

One of these was the proposal by the convention committee to have the next convention of the Grand Lodge open on Friday night instead of on Monday morning. The advocates of the plan argued that the religious period of the week on Friday night and Saturday morning would lend a spiritual advantage to the convention which could be gained no other way.

The proposal was included in the report of the convention committee. When it was moved that the report be adopted as a whole an excited discussion was the outcome. It lasted some twenty minutes. At the end of this time the proposal that the next convention should meet on Friday was eliminated and laid aside for future consideration, while the remainder of the convention report was adopted unanimously.

Rabbi Geo. Fox, of Fort Worth, Texas, gave a report on the work of the various lodges throughout the South, saying that officers of some had failed to spread certain propaganda material in the vicinities of their lodges.

The chairman of the intellectual culture committee, Joseph Hirsh, told of the intellectual advancement activities of his committee. The details of the report were taken up one by one and, with one or two exceptions, were adopted.

The endowment committee gave a report during which endowment loans were discussed and the matter of interest brought up. The report was tabled for future action after it had been suggested that five men be appointed to a committee which should investigate the interest problem and report at the next session of the Grand Lodge.

The report of the social service committee was unanimously adopted with a condition that certain financial questions in it should be referred to the financial committee.

Closing Session.

At 3 o'clock delegates reassembled for the closing session. Considerable business still remained unfinished, but in a little over two hours there was nothing left unattended to. The installation of the newly elected officers was the first thing to be taken up in the closing session, and Joseph Hirsh performed the installation ceremony in a most impressive manner. This over, Victor H. Hexter brought in a report for the finance committee which contained, among other things, a recommendation to donate one thousand dollars to the Jewish War Sufferers' Fund.

The report was unanimously adopted. So was also adopted a resolution read by Isador Shapiro to assure the President of the United States of the readiness and eagerness on the part of the members of the district to support him and to uphold the beloved flag of this country in the present crisis to the sacrifice, if needs be, of their very lives. Quite a heated discussion ensued upon the reading of one clause in that resolution, which provided for an indorsement of the compulsory conscription measure. But the entire resolution was finally carried.

There being no business to attend to, Rabbi Louis Witt closed the Forty-fourth Annual Convention of District No. 7, I. O. B. B., with prayer.

MINNESOTA LODGE, ST. PAUL, MINN.

The regular monthly meeting of Minnesota Lodge, No. 157, of St. Paul, held on Sunday evening, April 2, 1917, was a literary evening. A program of unusual merit was arranged by the co-operation between the Intellectual Advancement Committee and the Entertainment Committee.

The following program was successfully carried out: Address by Mr. H. W. Davis, on "The Menorah and the Jewish Student"; Miss Matilda Sprung, on "Higher Education for Jewish Women"; Mr. A. Sheldon, on "Jewish Labor Movement in America", and Mr. David London on "Homogeneity of Our People". Violin solos by Mr. V. Schwartz, and a vocal solo by Miss M. MONTEFIORE LODGE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Montefiore Lodge No. 70 held a public meeting at Temple Center of Beth Zion, 599 Delaware Avenue, Buffalo, N. Y., on April 4th. The speaker of the evening was Colonel John B. Weber, who spoke on "The Jew in Russia". Colonel Weber was United States Commissioner of Immigration under President Harrison and visited Russia at the time, making a special study of conditions there. The Colonel pointed out that the Jews can be a power for industrial and economic development in Russia, if given a fair chance, and foretold that the Jews would soon prove as valuable to Russia as they are to the United States. The President of the Lodge, Brother Sundel J. Holender, and Brother I. M. Hellwitz, as well as Brother Samuel Cristall, are devoting much time to the progress of the Lodge.

JULIUS HOUSEMAN LODGE, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The evening was devoted to a discussion of the proposition for a Social Center for Grand [illegible] with Bro. S. Clarence Weil [illegible] There were several [illegible] and some good ideas advanced. Everyone felt that this free discussion served to clarify matters and make a clear cut objective for those who favor the establishment of an institution of this nature. More than a hundred people were in attendance and at the conclusion of the discussion, refreshments were served and the party enjoyed dancing until after midnight.

JORDAN LODGE, NEW YORK.

Jordan Lodge No. 15 held a patriotic rally on Thursday, April 19th, the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, which was well attended. The orator of the occasion was Brother Judge Aaron J. Levy. The invitation which the Lodge sent out for this occasion contained the following: "Thus you receive the second lesson that we teach—Loyalty to our Country". Among the speakers of the evening were Brother Alfred M. Goldfogel, Brother Joseph Rosenzweig, President of the District, and Brother Morris Rosenfeld. This program was followed by a dance.

COVENANT LODGE, NO. 569, DULUTH, MINN.

Patriotism prevailed at the regular meeting of Covenant Lodge; No. 569, of Duluth, Minn., held on Tuesday evening, April 24, 1917, in the vestry rooms of Temple Emanuel.

Resolutions were adopted pledging the support of the lodge to President Wilson, the American Congress and the Army and Navy officers. The lodge directed also the purchase of a large American flag and 200 copies of "The Star Spangled Banner" for distributing among the pupils in the Sabbath School. Plans were outlined for the annual banquet and class initiation of the lodge to be held in the first week in May, when it is expected that several representatives of the Grand Lodge will attend. A class of 25 candidates will be initiated.

B'nai B'rith of Philadelphia

JOSHUA LODGE, PHILADELPHIA.

By J. Solis-Cohen, Jr., President.

Joshua Lodge today occupies a unique position among the B'nai B'rith Lodges in this District.

It is by far the largest lodge in membership, not only in this city, but in the states of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and West Virginia.

From the time of its inception it has been active in carrying out the principles of the B'nai B'rith. No institution could grow and gain prestige unless its standards were high and such standards were fulfilled. Joshua Lodge has maintained its position in the community and has kept pace with the growth of the Order. Like the Order itself, Joshua Lodge is now greater than it ever was. This lodge never lacked men who were willing to give of their time and energy in order to fulfill the ideals of the Order. Young men were always ready to assist the older men.

Joshua Lodge survived the crucial period of the Civil War. It has cared for widows and orphans. It is a matter of pride to its members that Joshua Lodge never turned away any one who came to seek aid or assistance from it.

Joshua Lodge contributed the largest sum, years ago, for the erection of Covenant Hall, the old B'nai B'rith Building in this city, and will likely do the same when the time comes for the erection of the imposing new B'nai B'rith Building.

It has had among the members the leading men in the Jewish community of the past, such as Dr. Morris Jastrow, Rev. Dr. Sabato Morais, Arnold Kohn. Today, the high calibre of the membership still prevails, and in it one can find professional men, merchants, college professors, soldiers, authors and artists.

Joshua Lodge was the largest contributor to the old Manual Training School in this city as well as the Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children at Erie.

It was first in its contribution to the war sufferers in Europe. The lodge was also the first to begin the modern Social Service Work in this city. It had the first Big Brother Committee as well as the first Prisoners' Aid Committee.

At its meetings, lectures and debates [illegible] ab[illegible] and it may be said to be the center of B'nai B'rith activity in this city.

LINCOLN LODGE, PHILADELPHIA.

Lincoln Lodge No. 780, I. O. B. B., has met with remarkable success in its short existence of over a year. Organized, as it was, by a handful of men on Jan. 5, 1916, aided by that indefatigable worker, David Phillips, Esq., its first president, and ably assisted by many others, to a great degree discloses the reason for its meteoric success. At the very outset these men, animated by purely humanitarian and Jewish ideals, breathed into every link in the chain of Lincoln Lodge the same spirit that moved them, and thus its progress is marked by the addition to its rank of members who earnestly lend themselves in endeavoring to advance the magnificent principles for which the B'nai B'rith stands.

When but five months in existence, Lincoln Lodge tendered to its members and their friends the first May dance at the Hotel Walton. That event proved to be a notable and marked success, inasmuch as it cemented more firmly the bonds of friendship previously existing between a number of the members and helped to create new ones. That event was so well thought of and so much spoken about that it created the desire in many to affiliate thmselves with this new organization—the newest link in the B'nai B'rith chain.

During its year of existence it has had the pleasure of listening to many men of prominence who have traveled from distant cities to speak to them.

On Jan. 4, 1917, it celebrated its first year of existence by tendering to the Grand Lodge officers, its members and their friends, the first annual banquet, which was held at the Hotel Walton, and proved to be a brilliant success.

Its membership constitutes some of the brilliant and intellectual members among the young Jewry of Philadelphia, numbering, as it does, persons successful in every walk of life. Its meetings are full of interest and the social atmosphere that permeates them has in a large measure established the magnet of attraction.

Lincoln Lodge is but in its infancy, and from its very rapid growth, evidenced [illegible] its undertakings, it fairly promises to [illegible] a nucleus and a center for Jewish activities in Philadelphia. With a single [illegible] usefulness it proposes to unselfishly and untiringly devote all its energies [illegible] the magnificent work of the [illegible] B'rith.

HAR SINAI LODGE, PHILADELPHIA.

By Harry S. Patowsky.

Har Sinai Lodge No. 8, the oldest lodge in District No. 3, was organized in July of 1852, and will this year celebrate its sixty-fifth anniversary.

Most of the early work of the District Grand Lodge No. 3 owes its inception to the foresight and efforts of the members of this lodge and some of the most prominent presidents of the District Grand Lodge were from among its members.

The Jewish Hospital of Philadelphia, located on Old York Road, was organized and established by a number of members of Har Sinai Lodge, who later brought it on the floor of the Grand Lodge and had the District take an active part in its formation. A memorial in testimony thereof may be seen erected on the inside walls of the present hospital buildings.

Every call for aid, whether from the city, state or nation, has always met with a hearty response from this organization, and its social affairs for the raising of funds for purely philanthropic purposes were, in years gone by, noted among the social events of their season.

Although the oldest lodge in the District, its membership is composed to a large extent of young men, and its meetings are sociable, wide awake and instructive, and its work full of vim and energy.

Charity Ball.

Graced by the presence of nearly one thousand of the flower of Philadelphia Jewry, the first ball of the combined lodges of the Order, given on the evening of April 2, was an unquestioned success.

Joshua, Har Sinai and Lincoln lodges were represented by large delegations, and many notables of the Order were present.

Specialty dances artistically done by [illegible]ed amateurs were a striking feature. [illegible] proceeds of the affair are to go to [illegible] General Fund of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of Erie, Pa.

Mr. David Bartin was Chairman of the General Committee and he was assisted by an organization of about two hundred men and women divided into various sub-committees.

Freda Largman Lodge.

The first meeting of Freda Largman Lodge, No. 805, B'nai B'rith, since its institution, was held on Wednesday evening, March 25th. Fourteen new members were initiated at this meeting. Social Service and Prison Aid Committees were appointed to work and cooperate with the present committees from the other lodges of this city. A fund of $150.00 was raised by the lodge for the Erie Orphanage, at Erie, Pa. The lodge will celebrate "Mothers' Day" on Sunday, May 13th, by a banquet at Mosebachs. A large attendance is expected.

Joshua Lodge.

A well attended meeting of Joshua Lodge listened to a most interesting and illuminating address on the abrogation of the secret ceremonials of the Order by Rabbi Eli Mayer.

The question was discussed by Dr. Solis-Cohen and Messrs. Frank Hahn, Charles Asnis and David Bortin.

The president, J. Solis-Cohen and Messrs. Braude and Weinstock reported on the activities of the Prison Aid Committee during the Passover holidays, especially referring to the Seder at the Eastern Penitentiary. Mr. David Bortin, Chairman of the B'nai B'rith Charity Ball, made a partial report for his committee in which he expressed his gratification at the unquestioned success of the Charity Ball and gave praise to those who worked with him. Mr. J. Solis-Cohen will endeavor to have some speaker of note address the lodge regularly.

All the tables were set in true old-fashioned Seder style. Every person was provided with a haggadah, the text being, however, both in Hebrew and English. As the Seder progressed, Rabbi Wolsey explained the significance of many of the passages.

Brother Nathan Loeser, Chairman of the Seder Committee, who was also President of the Euclid Ave. Temple, presided. The audience took part in the singing of the traditional music and the dinner was composed of the usual Passover dishes.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, of Chicago, Social Service Director of the Order, and Brother Gustavus Loevinger, of St. Paul, chairman of the propaganda committee of the District Grand Lodge, paid an official visit to Sioux City Lodge, at Sioux City, Iowa. They arrived on April 28, 1917, were met at the train by Brother Rabbi Emmanuel Sternheim, and at noontime were entertained at luncheon by Brothers Fribourg and M. Pill.

In the evening Dr. Coffee spoke in Rabbi Sternheim's Temple and Brother Loevinger addressed a club of twenty young men as the Ami Club.

As a result of Brother Loevinger's address, the club unanimously resolved that every member old enough to qualify to apply for membership in the new lodge to be organized in Sioux City.

On Saturday noon, the visiting Grand Lodge Officers were the guests of Rabbi Sternheim at a noon meeting of the Sociological Club of the City where Dr. Coffee made a short address about the contributions of the B'nai B'rith and Judaism to America.

On Sunday morning Dr. Coffee occupied the pulpit in Rabbi Sternheim's Temple and expounded to a large audience the B'nai B'rith idea.

In the evening a B'nai B'rith rally was held in the Sioux City Hebrew Institute. Brother Loevinger acted as chairman and after a short musical program Dr. Coffee made an eloquent appeal, which was followed with brief remarks by Mr. Davidson and Rabbi Sternheim. As a result of the appeal more than fifty men signified their willingness to join the lodge. A committee of five was appointed to canvass all situations and to arrange all details with reference to the reorganization of the existing lodge.

UNITED CITIES LODGE, JOPLIN, MO.

At a meeting of United Cities Lodge, No. 533, of Joplin, Mo., held on April 8, 1917, an initiation of candidates was held, which brought the membership up to 120. The membership of the lodge has been practically doubled within the last two years, as a result of the renewed energy displayed in the interests of the Order.

An important measure was adopted by the lodge on motion of Bro. Rabbi Jos. Leiser, to the effect that the lodge appoint a committee on patriotism, with the object to inspire all the Jewish residents of the District with patriotic zeal and to manifest in a visible manner their allegiance to the Country and their loyalty to the Government.

The lodge has also undertaken to sponsor the work of the American Jewish Relief Committee in the District and appoint a committee to arrange for a mass meeting in the near future for the purpose of arousing the people to the necessity of contributing liberal sums for the relief of Jewish war sufferers.

The Entertainment Committee of the lodge has been conducting monthly social affairs in the lodge and has been eminently successful in its efforts.

It is particularly interesting that in the recent survey of Jewish inmates in Connecticut institutions made under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith Council of Jewish women there was only one Jewish inmate from Bridgeport, which is gratifying in view of the remarkable growth of the city.

Brother Chas. Shapiro delivered an address at the B'nai B'rith headquarters in New York before the Get-Together Club on "The Americanization of the Immigrant." DAUGHTERS OF B'NAI B'RITH.

The Daughters of the B'nai Brith, Chapter No. 1, which is affiliated with Maccabee Lodge No. 71 of I. O. B. B., and which was organized by Hon. Clarence Y. Palitz about three years ago, have been carrying on the good work which they have organized.

Since their inception, they have endeavored to do all they could to remedy the conditions of the poor, and this last Passover, as is their custom, they again distributed thousands of pounds of foodstuffs to the poor in the City of New York, each family receiving matzoths, matzoth flour, potatoes, onions, eggs, etc. The food was given out from two distributing stations, one at 4000 Third Avenue, New York City, and one at 184 South Second Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. Many poor and needy families were in this way provided with food for the Passover Holidays.

The organization is holding a closing reception and dance at their club rooms at the Savigny, 229 Lenox Avenue, on May 22, 1917, and an enjoyable evening is looked forward to by all.

The officers are: Rose B. Schiff, President; Mrs. Byrdie R. Kessler, Vice President; Augusta Hammer, Treasurer; Juliet Joseph, Secretary; Zelda Margolies, Corresponding Secretary; Goldie Strassman, Naveah; Hannah Langer, Inside Guardian; Fannie Altman, Outside Guardian; Patron, Hon. Clarence Y. Palitz.

VANCOUVER, B. C.

A joint meeting of Samuel Lodge, No. 668, and its Ladies' Auxiliary, was held on Wednesday evening, March 21, and proved to be a literary and musical treat of high order. A lecture was given by Judge Schultz on "The Merchant of Venice". Miss Lena Peace gave a piano solo and Mr. A. I. Goodstone rendered songs in English and French. Judge Schultz, in his lecture proved that Shakespeare's "Shylock" was a false portrayal of the Jew as an individual and as a type of his race. The proceeds of the evening were given to a fund now being raised by the various organizations of the city for the equipment of a military hospital for returned invalid soldiers.

PHOENIX LODGE, PHOENIX, ARIZ.

Phoenix Lodge, No. 799, is making good progress and is gradually finding a place for itself in the community. The lodge has practically taken over all of the Jewish relief work and is also in control of the cemetery located there for a good many years. The lodge was instrumental in defeating the "Bible Reading in the Schools" bill before the legislature. Plans are being matured for securing the services of a Rabbi for the next holidays and the lodge is active in this matter also. Phoenix Lodge has fostered the organization of a section of the Council for Jewish Women, and this new section will be started within the next few days, and will no doubt mean the beginning of a Sabbath School as well as other activities. The lodge has given a number of social functions which were much enjoyed by the members, and considering that the lodge has only been in existence for a few months, it must be conceded that considerable work has been accomplished by it.

COVENANT LODGE, DULUTH, MINN.

An old-fashioned "Spelling Bee," between two teams of men and women was a feature of the "Open House" party staged by Covenant Lodge, No. 569, of Duluth, Minn., in the vestry rooms of Temple Emanuel on Tuesday evening, April 17, 1917. About 125 persons attended the entertainment. President A. B. Kapplin acted as Chairman and called off the 200 words selected by Mr. Leonard Young, principal of the Central High School.

The two teams of twelve persons each had dwindled down until Miss E. Silberstein was left on one side and Mr. Abr. Feldman on the other. Mr. Feldman won out. Small medals were presented to the members of the winning team.

The entertainment was opened with the playing of a medley of popular airs by Miss E. Greenberg, after which the audience sang "The Star Spangled Banner". Vocal numbers and fancy dancing were part of the program. A short talk was also given by Rabbi Maurice Lefkovitz on the new Bible translation recently issued by the Jewish Publication Society of America.

Dr. Bogen explained how the B'nai B'rith could make itself felt in every community by taking an active part in this work, and told of many interesting incidents from real life.

The meeting was attended by about one hundred persons. who besides being treated to the experiences of Dr. Bogen, heard several beautiful violin selections by Master Paul Katz and Miss Esther Rosensweet.

Six new candidates were initiated, among them being Mr. Samuel Ziegler, of Muncie, Ind., and Mr. Edw. E. Frank, of Richmond, Ind. The lodge ratified the recent action of the trustees in contributing $250 to the ten million dollar relief fund, permitting this amount to be taken from its reserve fund.

After the program had been carried out, the newly admitted members all gave interesting little talks on their first impressions, and the meeting adjourned into a pleasant little sociable, with luncheon and music.

NEWPORT NEWS LODGE, NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

Mr. M. Levy, of Norfolk, Va., was the principal speaker at a recent social meeting of Newport News Lodge. The meeting was well attended by the general public and the program was an excellent one from every standpoint. Mr. Levy took as his subject "The Principles of the B'nai B'rith", declaring in the course of his address that it mattered little what a man's religion is for he is judged by his acts rather than by what he professes and that this applied to Jew as well as Christian.

Mr. H. Reyner, President of the Lodge, acted as Master of Ceremonies and introduced the speakers, the first of whom was Reverend Dr. Speyer, who spoke on "The Principles of Judaism". The next speaker was Mr. W. Copland, editor of the "Daily Press", who spoke on "The Friendly Relations between the Jews and Gentiles in Newport News". The remainder of the program was devoted to musical and vocal numbers and following the completion of the program, refreshments were served, after which the Lodge held a business session and twelve candidates were initiated.

Toledo Lodge, No. 183, has made a good beginning in the Big Brother movement. In the latter part of March a Big Brother organization was effected at a noon luncheon meeting in the Boody House.

I. Kadis was made president and Emil Schragenheim, secretary. A number of the Big Brothers were assigned little brothers.

In the early part of April an entertainment was given for the little brothers, between fifty and sixty boys being present.

THE SACREDNESS OF LIFE.

How often have we taken a farewell glance at a friend without having been aware of it at the time. Had we known that our eyes were meeting for the last time on earth, they would have said far sweeter words. Not until we know all that God knows can we estimate the full power and the sacredness of some one life which may seem the humblest in the world.—John Ruskin.

B'NAI B'RITH—Sons of the Covenant

The word "covenant" is not of modern origin nor of modern usage. The average grammar school graduate does not know the meaning of this term; the average high school graduate does not know its application and the average college graduate does not employ it in speech. This word goes back to the remote period of eastern civilization and Oriental culture. In modern parlance the word "covenant" would mean a compact, an agreement, a contract. The covenant to which we have reference in our fraternity goes back 4,000 years to the first chapter of Jewish history. God and Abraham formed a compact, they made an agreement.

This idea, that God and Abraham did consummate a covenant, that God and man can form an alliance, that the Creator and His creature can fraternize, is Israel's first contribution to humanity. If you search the mythologies and theologies of the heathen nations contemporaneous with Abraham, and even a thousand years later, you will find that God and man are practically at opposite poles. Idolatry regards the deities as the authors of all the evil that afflicts mankind. Paganism insists that the gods are angry with the world, that the divinities are wrathful. The heathen's constant care and anxiety is to find a way to appease God's wrath, to placate a jealous deity, to propitiate an insulted divinity. Moloch, for example, a heathen God mentioned in the Bible, could be placated only when man threw his own offspring into the flames as a sacrifice. In India and China human sacrifices, especially of the firstborn son, were the means of bringing the offerer into closer relation with the gods. The Akkadain king sacrificed his firstborn and best loved son, "his offering for his life he gave" to form a covenant-union with his divinity. In Central America the heart of the human sacrifice was placed in the mouth of the idol. The Mexican aborigines went to war in order to feed their divinities with the martial heroes fallen on the battlefield. Human sacrifice was thus required to propitiate an offended divinity.

Christianity, though the daughter of Judaism, as designated by Voltaire, unfortunately for it and for us, adopted the heathen doctrine rather than the Hebrew interpretation of God. It may deny that as often and as eloquently as it can, Christianity is guilty of this glaring mistake. According to Christianity, Catholic and Protestant, Adam, the first man, because he had eaten forbidden fruit in the Garden of Eden and thus had disobeyed the divine command, had offended God. For 2,000 years God's anger was continuous, until either He Himself, or His only begotten Son, took on flesh and assumed the appearance of man. He suffered martyrdom, was crucified, was made the Atonement sacrifice, and thus God's anger was propitiated. Christianity goes further and maintains that those of us who do not believe that God can be placated only through the medium of such a horrible sacrifice, will be eternally damned. "Without shedding of blood there is no remission of sin", is the doctrine of the church.

The first protest that brought Abraham into the public arena, producing a new philosophy of life, a new view of the universe and a new conception of man, was to deny that God needs human sacrifice. As an inevitable result of this conviction, Isaac, who already lay bound on the altar with the knife in his father's hand, was not sacrificed as a burnt offering. The Prophet Micah emphasizes this very protest in these words: "Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul"? No.

It is true that when the Temple Jerusalem was flourishing, animal sacrifice occupied a prominent position in the life of Israel. However, it was not a divine command, but rather a cult—a matter of choice. In order that it should not be misrepresented, the Prophets and Psalmists thundered against a superstitious interpretation of animal sacrifice. Their message invariably was: The Lord takes no delight in the slaughter of animals; the bloody sacrifices are an abomination unto Him. What He requires is purity of heart, justice, mercy, love, the relief of distress, the care of the widow, the protection of the fatherless and the shielding of the stranger.

As a result of this covenant, God speaks of the first Hebrew: "My friend Abraham". In all ages poets, philosophers and essayists, from the Bible, Homer, Plato and Cicero, down to Bacon, Montaigne, Emerson and Tennyson, have been fascinated by and have recognized the potency, force and beauty of friendship. Solomon affirms: "There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother". The proverb runs: "A father is a treasure, a brother is a comfort, but a friend s both". "Freundes Stimme, Gottes Stimme"—"A friend's voice is God's voice". Jeremy Taylor declares: "Friendship is that by which the world is most blessed and receives most good". The perennial question thus once more presents itself unto us who belong to fraternities: "What is friendship"? "What is a friend"? There are at least two answers. The over-zealous optimist says that everybody is his friend. He has friends in the lodge room, in the clubhouse, friends whom he meets in the barber-shop or in the restaurant, friends with whom he goes downtown in the morning or uptown in the evening—everybody is his friend. He even quotes the oft repeated saying: "It is better to have a thousand friends than a single enemy," or "a thousand friends are not too many; one enemy is one too many". To be sure, the man who can make everyone whom he meets on earth his friend will find, if he ever goes to Heaven, that not a single angel is his friend. History and experience prove that the greatest benefactors of mankind have made implacable enemies. Moses, the emancipator of Israel, was threatened with death by stoning. Socrates, whom the Oracle pronounced the wisest of men, was forced to drink a cup of poison. Isaiah, the prince of the Prophets, was cut in two. When Washington announced that he would not accept a third nomination, one congressman brought in a resolution thanking God that "at last the United States would get rid of this plague, Washington". "We love him for the enemies he has made", was the retort of a United States senator to those who opposed a renomination to Grover Cleveland.

On the other hand, the over-zealous pessimist contends that there is no such thing as friendship. With Bacon he holds: "There is little friendship in the world", or with Napoleon, "Friendship is but a name", or with one of Shakespeare's characters, "Friendship's full of dregs" or again with Henry D. Thoreau, "Friendship is evanescent in every man's experience". The cynic makes capital of the bitter experience of Timon of Athens, who distributes his riches among those whom he has rescued from misery. Through his generosity this nobleman becomes poor, and they who had imposed on his friendship, gnawed his bones bare, sucked the marrow out and left him cut down to the roots and withered, would not only not relieve him, but would not even look at him. When the sun of prosperity shines over a man's head, when success is his lot, and when he entertains, then, to be sure, everyone is his friend. But when the clouds of disappointment become thick, when failure overtakes him and when misfortune is his lot, then nobody is his friend. He even quotes King David, who said in haste: "All men are liars." An American Indian was asked by a European missionary, "What is heaven"? The red man answered: "Heaven is a place where the white man will not lie". A Russian dramatist ironically remarked: "In Russia everybody steals, except Christ, and He does not, because His hands are nailed to the cross."

Since everybody has his price; since everybody is instinctively unworthy of trust; since everybody is inherently disloyal; and, finally, since everybody is naturally devoid of sentiment, man cannot make a friend; hence there is no friendship.

Let us realize that opinions of both the pessimist and the optimist are exaggerated. The best test of friendship may be obtained from rabbinic interpretation: "Whenever friendship or love depends on a material cause, with the passing away of that cause, love, too, passes away; but if it be not dependent upon such a cause, it will not pass away forever". The test for the latter is the friendship that existed between David and Jonathan. As the crown prince, Jonathan was the heir to the throne and the exalted position of a king. Jonathan's friendship for David meant the loss of the crown, or the throne and of the exalted position; yea, what is more, the loss of the confidence and the good-will of his own royal father. To Jonathan, however, friendship meant soul affinity—two hearts knitted together indissolubly— and therefore he sacrificed all for David, his friend. Little wonder that when Jonathan died David pronounced upon him the most tender and most affectionate eulogy that ever sprang from human lips: "I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan! Thy love for me was more wonderful than the love of women". The significance of this Oriental analogy is that man's love for woman may have for its basis a material motive—wealth or beauty, position or personal charm. The friendship of Jonathan for David had absolutely no ulterior motive, for it meant for Jonathan self-sacrifice, suffering, martyrdom. Thus friendship is the marriage of pure souls, one soul in two bodies—a friend is but another self.

The Bible furnishes another illustrious example of true friendship, this time of two women—Naomi and Ruth. As a result of drought, hunger and excruciating poverty, Naomi, her husband and her two sons left Judea for Moab with a purpose of replenishing their fortune. In a similar way, millions of Europeans go to America. But misfortune followed them in the most distressing manner. In that foreign country Naomi lost her husband and her two sons. Resolved to go back to starve in Judea rather than in Moab, she tells her former daughters-in-law to leave her and look for happiness in their native country, Moab. In never-to-be-forgotten words, which have become classical, words repeated by Mrs. Isadore Strauss when her husband besought her to leave the Titanic wreck to save her life and to let him meet the inevitable, Ruth exclaims to Naomi: "Entreat me not to leave thee and to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people and thy God my God; where thou diest, will I die, and there I will be buried; the Lord do so to me and more also if aught but death part thee and me." This eulogy of friendship was uttered by Ruth to her poverty-stricken and dejected Naomi when Ruth could expect nothing else in leaving her native country, Moab, for Judea except to suffer from want of poverty in a foreign country—a result of unalloyed friendship. Ruth, which in the abstract means a "friend", had no other thought than to be attached to the person whom she loved, without any sense of need, without any advantage being sought, except the advantage inherent in friendship, even while one does not pursue it. Thus friendship does not mean to get but to give; not to receive but to offer; not to obtain but to minister; not merely to be loved but to love; not self but the other. Everything that savors of selfishness is excluded from its scope. He who is too much a friend to himself is a friend to no one else—the self-lover has no rival. In a self-forgetful love, with the selfish element eliminated, no one can be disappointed. Aristotle affirms, "Who ceases to be a friend, never was one".

"The friends thou hast, and their adoption tried, Grapple them to thy soul with ropes of steel".

Such unselfish friendship is best described in the words of the Prophet Isaiah, who said that God had spoken of Abraham: "My friend Abraham". If the Patriarch had said this of the Almighty, he might have expected something in return, that friendship might have been based on material motive. But it was God who said, "My friend Abraham", and He could expect nothing in return. There could be no ulterior motive, no condition of reciprocity, for the whole world is His.

The friendship that God had for Abraham was the result of knowledge, as the text declares that God said, "For I know him" (Abraham). True knowledge of each other will eliminate among people a good deal of prejudice. Knowledge leads to love; love is the deepest knowledge; affection is the truest understanding.

It is an established fact that the best that Christianity possesses was contributed by Jews. The God idea, the Bible, the Decalogue, Moses, the Prophets, the Apostles, the Sabbath, the Sermon on the Mount, the Golden Rule, yea, even the Nazarene himself—all these have come from Israel. Whether it is ordained, destiny, or merely an accident, the Jew has been the religious teacher of mankind. Benjamin Disraeli says: "One half of the civilized world worships a Jew, Jesus, and the other half worships a Jewess, Mary". If a people is entitled to reverence and respect from the Christian, that good will is due to the Jew. If right and appreciation were to prevail, the Christian would be grateful, a friend of the Jew. For the Christian to persecute a Jew, his real benefactor, is similar to a daughter beating her mother. Why, then, this outrageous prejudice? Why this animosity? Why this persecution? "What are the reasons for this almost endless persecution of the Jew from the fourth century to the nineteenth"? asks former President William Howard Taft. And this is his explanation: "I regret to say that it must be attributed mainly to the intolerance of the Christians".

The Christian does not understand the Jew. As a result of such intolerance members of the Society of Friends were the victims of bloody persecution at the hands of the Puritans. It is worthy of observation that the name "Quaker" came into use as the result of an intolerant sneer—a term of derision. When one of their speakers translated "quake" instead of "shake" before the Lord, somebody shouted: "Quaker". When these Quakers entered Boston after the direct prohibition of the law supported by Governor Endicott, four persons—three men and one woman—were hanged on the gallows. It is indeed strange that the Society of Friends composed of the sweetest, loveliest, the most genial and the most loyal of folk, was designated dangerous. The Puritan did not understand the Quaker. Daniel Webster, in a speech in the United States Senate, spoke in a derogatory way of a Southern senator Asked whether he knew his antagonist personally, he answered: "I do not know him. If I knew him, perhaps I would like him". What a pity that so few people make an honest effort to come into closer relationship with one another outside of their accustomed circle!

Who can measure the physical wreckage, the mental agony, the heart anguish, the spiritual torment we cause each other as a result of our narrow views, petty selfishness and snap judgments. Since it requires neither brain nor heart, what is easier than to find fault, to condemn offhand and to pronounce a verdict without investigation as to causes and motives. Only the mentally indolent and spiritually sluggish will judge the many, yea, a whole race, by the few they chance to meet. Before the introduction of telegraph and telephone the nations of the earth were isolated, with the result that in each country patriotism meant prejudice and hate for each other. Now that the world is being drawn closer together by the cable and the transatlantic liner, the wireless, the airship, the submarine telephone, and universal education, the human race has become one centralized community. Through the wonderful development of science and the marvelous work of the inventor, the civilized nations have learned to know, to understand and to respect each other. Goethe declares: "Only let nations, like individuals, get to know each other and mutual animosity will resolve itself into mutual assistance, and instead of natural enemies, as neighboring countries are sometimes styled, we shall all be mutual friends".

"Could we forbear dispute and practice love,
We should agree as angels do above".

God, the all-seeing Eye, who searches the recesses of the human heart, designates Abraham as his friend—as a result of knowledge which spells love. As a result of His friendship, based on knowledge, God forms a compact with Abraham—a mutual agreement. God, as His part of the alliance, promises Abraham continuous protection. According to the Rabbis, Nimrod, the despot, threw Abraham into the fiery furnace, to punish him thus for denouncing idolatry. The covenant required that God should protect him. And Abraham was accordingly saved from the fiery death.

The reason why God made the covenant was that Abraham, as his part of the agreement, "would command his children and his household after him to observe the way of the Lord". Thus not only Abraham, but also his children, his descendants, those who will come after him, are included in this covenant. To Isaac, too, God said: "I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham, thy father . . . and in thy seed all the nations of the earth be blessed". According to the Rabbinic tradition, Jacob, on his deathbed, called his twelve sons before him and reminded them of the covenant devolving upon them as a birthright.

Moses had this covenant in mind when he told the children of Israel in Egypt, even before the emancipation, that the plagues that fell upon the Egyptians but spared the Israelites were in order "that you may tell it into the ears of thy son and thy son's son". Later in the Sinaic Desert the Emancipator said to the children of Israel: "If tomorrow thy children will ask thee, then thou shalt say unto thy son". As a divine command the Lawgiver laid down the injunction: "Thou shalt teach thy children". In his farewell address to all Israel assembled before him Moses announced: "Not only with you do I form this covenant, but with you who are before me and with those who are not before me this day".

In the last chapter of our Bible, Malachai, the last of that wonderful group of prophets, seals the Book with the following words: "Behold, I will send unto you Elijah, the Prophet, and he shall turn the heart of the father unto the children and the hearts of the children unto their father". Elijah's duty will thus be to have the children assume the responsibility of the covenant God made with their fathers.

There is a Rabbinic tradition which runs thus: "When God was to give the Torah to Moses, He demanded some surety that the Israelites would observe the divine law." Moses offered Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as a pledge. But the Almighty protested "The patriarchs belong to the past". Dead men cannot redeem promises. Then Moses offered the whole generation encamped at the foot of Sinai. Again the Lord protested: "They, too, will die". As a last resort Moses offered as surety "the generations still unborn". God finally accepted the future generations. Therein lies the immortality of Israel.

In one of the finest Italian literary masterpieces the author describes a reprobate, unworthy descendant of an old, illustrious family, who was reclaimed to a life of virtue and patriotism by sympathetically gazing one day upon the [illegible] portraits of his heroic ancestors. The figures seemed to appeal to him to so order his life as to be worthy of such a distinguished lineage. What nobler [illegible] ancestry than ours who, in the [illegible] of time, the gray dawn of history, [illegible] an alliance, made a covenant [illegible]. Those who are ashamed of [illegible] ancestors would not like to hear [illegible] ancestors' opinion of them.

"We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons, no doubt, will think us so."
—Pope.

Sons of the Covenant! The original covenant formed between God and Abraham meant not only their fathers, but also the children—yea, the unborn generations. Members of the order, are you solicitous for the welfare of your fraternity? Then initiate your sons. Ours is not merely a covenant of the fathers; we are B'nai B'rith—Sons of the Covenant!

"Shall we call those noble who disgrace
Their lineage, proud of an illustrious race?
Seek not to shine by borrowed lights alone,
But with your fathers' glories blend your own."
—Gifford.

THE RABBINICAL COLLEGE OF AMERICA.

The Convention of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada (Agudath Harabbonim) held in New York last week, and which was attended by about one hundred and fifty rabbis from all parts of the country and Canada, took energetic action in support of the Rabbinical College of America (Yeshiva Rabbi Isaac Elchanan).

The rabbis devoted a separate session to the Rabbinical College and adopted the following resolutions:

1. That Yeshibaha, Talmud Torahs, and Parochial Schools throughout the country with advanced Talmud courses urge fitting graduates to go into the Rabbinical College.
2. That all members of the Agudath Harabbonim devote at least two Sabbaths during the next year to travel in the country to make progaganda for the $200,000 endowment fund which the Agudath Harabbonim is raising for the Rabbinical College.

Dr. Revel presented to the convention a report on Jewish Education, and the following resolutions were adopted:

1. That the Committee on Education of the Agudas Harabbonim of which Dr. B. Revel, president of the faculty of the college, is chairman, prepare a statement of the purpose and practicability of Jewish Parochial schools.
2. That this committee examine all the text books now in use in all Yeshibahs, Talmud Torahs, and Parochial Schools, as to their fitness; reject those found unsuitable and prepare whatever new text books it will find necessary.
3. That steps be taken to support and strengthen the Parochial Schools.

Tuesday evening, May 15, the faculty and directors of the college tendered a reception and dinner to the delegates to the convention. There were present some hundred rabbis. Speeches were made by Rabbis M. S. Margolies, [illegible] L. Leventhal, Philadelphia; E. Silver, Harrisburg; J. Rosenberg, Patterson; J. Siegel, Bayonne; M. Preil, Trenton; N. Roggen, New London (a graduate); D. Durak, D. Ginsburg, Wilkesbarre; Mr. Julius, J. Dukas and Dr. Revel.

The college is making preparations to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Rabbi Yitzchak Elchanan Spekter, the famous Rabbi of Kevno, after whom the college is named. In honor of the event the faculty and students will issue a volume of Torah. Several of the professors and instructors of the college have received their Smichah (Rabbinical degrees) from Rabbi Yitzchak Elchanan.

Mr. David Tannenbaum, a student of the college, has received the appointment of lecturer and principal of Congregation Ahavath Chesed, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The courses of lectures on Jewish History by Prof. Nahum Slousch, instructor in history, are attracting wide-spread attention.

Dr. Revel will represent the faculty of the college at the American Jewish Congress to be held at Washington in September during the coming year.

RUSSIAN JEWS IN ENGLAND TO SERVE.

The bill providing for the compulsory service of friendly aliens in the British army or for their return to their native lands to serve there has had two readings in the English Parliament. It was mentioned at the second reading of the bill that the Russian Government is in entire agreement with the provisions of the bill. Mr. Herbert Samuel, who supported the bill, asked the government authorities whether Russian citizens who will be conscripted will thereby become British citizens. He also pleaded the cause of rabbis that they should be exempt from service. The deputy for Stepney, the Jewish district, declared that the Christians residing in that district are very much provoked that the aliens should be exempt from service and that the political leaders of the district had to put forward special efforts to prevent riots against Jewish immigrants.

The New English Edition of Lessing's Nathan the Wise

By H. ELIASSOF

The Bloch Publishing Company has recently issued a new English edition of the famous dramatic poem, "Nathan the Wise," the wonderful work of the immortal German poet and humanist, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, the strongest human document presented to the world one hundred thirty-seven years ago.

The English version in this new edition is the one rendered by the Major-General Patrick Maxwell, published in the Scott Library series by Walter Scott, in London, which is considered to be the most accurate of all English translations of this great epic. This edition has been edited by George Alexander Kohut, the well-known American writer and bibliographer. The editor has added a timely preface, an interesting biographical sketch of the author and an instructive introduction. The latter comprises learned treatises on the genesis of the poem, on the relations of Moses Mendelssohn, who is generally taken as the model for the hero of the drama, and Lessing; an analysis of the plot, the characters and the Parable of the Three Rings, all of which show vast erudition, deep penetration and critical discrimination, and add much value to the new edition.

It is not for me to review the great literary masterpiece of Lessing, the first and foremost free-thinker of the golden age of German literature. Much greater minds than mine have done this work long ago. They have already pointed out the great intrinsic value, the immense importance and the prodigious prominence of Lessing's "Nathan the Wise" in the world of letters. They have dived down into Lessing's deep ocean of thought, brought up all the precious pearls of his ideas of universal tolerance and held them up to the view of an admiring world in all their overpowering brilliancy and in all their delicate and delicious shadings. It requires much more learning, much greater literary acumen, aye, and much more undaunted courage than I am endowed with to venture upon such holy ground where the trumpet of truth sounds its mighty message to mankind, where the revolving sword of justice guards the rights of man and where the eternal fires of the love of humanity flame and flash in unextinguishable glow. I will, therefore, only attempt to point out some beauty spots in the English translation, cull a few fine flowers from the fertile fields so richly cultivated by the editor and express some appreciation of the praiseworthy enterprise of the publishers in presenting to the public such a splendid and highly valuable English edition of Lessing's "Nathan the Wise", which is a vivid plea for tolerance and brotherhood, and therefore most timely and most opportune.

The English translation of General Maxwell was indeed well chosen, for while it is held very close to the original German, it is nevertheless clear, easy-flowing and abundant in genuine idiomatic beauties. The translator was especially apt in his rendition of the Parable of the Three Rings, which is a most salient point in the entire epic.

The editor refers in his preface to the present world war in plain terms. He certainly does not mince words. He pertinently points out the fact that the treaty obligation imposed by the aid of Disraeli upon Roumania in regard to the Jews was never enforced by the powers of Europe and he rightly asserts that the fate of the "little people" held in bondage still hangs in the balance. But he also becomes an optimistic prophet and makes the following hopeful statement: "Out of this holocaust must come a saner and sweeter humanity", which is very cheering and encouraging.

In the chapter on the genesis of the poem, in his introduction, the editor skillfully refutes Kuno Fischer, the eminent German critic, who in his essay on "Nathan the Wise" gives perhaps the most exhaustive analysis of the drama, wherein he points out the strong antithesis between the character of Nathan and Shylock and while he accepts the theory that Lessing in his hero depicted his friend, Mendelssohn, is rather unwilling to recognize in the great philosopher those shining qualities which Lessing so deeply admired in his Jewish friend. The editor quotes historical facts in support of his arguments and gains strong evidence in his favor.

In his treatise on Lessing and Mendelssohn, in the same introduction, the editor makes the following absorbingly interesting statement, which, as a psychological analysis of the characters of the two celebrated men is rather novel: "In character and attainments Lessing and Mendelssohn were singularly alike; yet each, in his excessive modesty, admired in the other the very qualities which distinguished both", and he proceeds to enumerate the best qualities of each which attracted one to the other.

In his analysis of the characters of the drama, also in the introduction, the editor says aptly of "Nathan": "One noted critic maintains that he alone, of all creations of fiction, approximates the Christ ideal. That he should stand head and shoulders above the personages marshaled before our eyes with such consummate artistry by the author is only proof of the widespread belief that he took his model from life and that, in the Jew, Lessing intended to portray his friend, Moses Mendelssohn, the German Socrates, who combined a splendid philosophic calm with worldly wisdom, and the sweet benignity of whose private life is a matter of common knowledge".

In the chapter on the Parable of the Three Rings, in the editor's introduction, there is a wealth of rare information, for instance: "It is not generally known that there are two singularly close parallels to our story in Jewish literature. The first account is taken from the work by Solomon Ibn Verga, a Spanish historian and physician, who lived in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries and whose Shebet Yehudah contains an account of sixty-four persecutions of the Jews and narrates many religious disputations. It was first printed in Turkey about 1550 and has been translated into several modern languages". After quoting at length from Ibn Verga's work and from the Orha-Sekel by the celebrated mystic, Abraham Abulafia, the editor continues: "The quaint story recorded in an old Hebrew polemical work against Christianity, entitled Nizzahon (Victory), generally supposed to have been written by a German, in the thirteenth century, at a time when Tartars played an important role and Palestine was still the scene of bloody battles, is of interest to us as showing that the idea of comparing the three religions became current in Germany at so early a period".

The volume is illustrated with a number of fine pictures. There are excellent portraits of Lessing and Mendelssohn; the first bears the poet's autograph and the second is a copy of the portrait dedicated in 1787 by the Jewish Free-school of Berlin to King Frederick II; also a likeness of the celebrated Austrian actor, Adolph von Sonnenthal, in his character of Nathan, which has made him world-famous, and a reproduction from an old drawing, showing Lessing and Lavater at chess with their mutual friend, Moses Mendelssohn. To these are added the fac-simile of the original title page, and a leaf of the author's first draught of the poem, in possession of a member of the Mendelssohn family in Berlin.

The publishers certainly deserve great credit for this excellent edition of "Nathan the Wise". In addition to an edition de lux they have also issued a popular edition at a moderate price, which places the work within the reach of all lovers of good literature.

At the time when the American Jews are fighting hard against the use of Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" in the public schools, Lessing's "Nathan the Wise" can to a certain extent serve as an antidote to the poisonous effects of Shakespeare's Shylock. For while Shakespeare's play helps to make the life of the Jew a greater tragedy, Lessing's poem instills hope in his heart and joy in his soul, for it helps humanity to become more tolerant and the brotherhood of man to embrace the whole world. At this time, when we are, so to say, on the eve of the American Jewish Congress, the voice of Lessing re-echoing from the past must support our appeals to the nations for Israel's recognition, for Israel's freedom and for justice to the Jew in all lands.

MANHATTAN LODGE AT THE YONKERS HOME.

It was a memorable day for the inmates of the Yonkers Home when Manhattan Lodge visited it on Sunday, May 20. Instead of giving refreshments to the members of the lodge the committee presented the inmates with pipes and tobacco for the men and candy for the women. And then they gave a remarkably fine entertainment managed by Harry Salter, the artists being Misses Sadie and Ruth Geld, Mme. Antoinette Frankel and Mr. Harry Salter.

A CHILD IN THE HOME

By Henry Berkowitz, D. D., Philadelphia

Education, it is conceded, is a continuous process. It begins with the earliest impressions of infancy and endures through all the processes of development throughout life. It is conditioned by the heritage of endowment with which the individual is born. It is subject to the influences of environment under which we pass onward through life.

Jewish education is the vehicle through which the rearing and training of the Jewish child can be most effectively wrought. Therefore the Jewish home is the first and proper school of the child's training.

I invite your attention to a consideration of some of those elementary and essential principles that must underlie all such training.

A child in the home! So familiar and commonplace is this that the full meaning of the fact is apt to elude us. The thrilling announcement formulated by the Prophet Isaiah, "Behold, a child has been born unto us", is repeated in the myriad homes of earth, and always with the like outburst of joy, of hope and wonder. The house may have been possessed of every need, of every comfort and luxury and been the abode of deepest affection, but not until it has been glorified by the mysterious gift of a new life has it become, in the fullest sense, a home.

The changes in the household marked by the advent of the child are nothing short of revolutionary. Everything perforce centers about the tiny little tyrant whose every outcry is a command which must forthwith be heeded. These external changes are but a faint index to those deeper, inner changes that with the coming of their child overcome its parents and in greater or less degree affect the whole circle of kindred and friends. To the mother, of course, comes first that flood of new, strange and unknown emotions that have power to transform even the lightest and most frivolous butterfly of a girl into a real woman. So mysterious, so sublime and beautiful is the new quality that enters her soul, the world has ever stood reverently and in awe before the tender charm and dignity of motherhood.

"Because God could not be everywhere, He created mothers", was the bold utterance of one of the Rabbis. This same sentiment of homage for the divine gift of grace that exalts a woman when she holds her babe tenderly to her bosom prompted almost every painter of the Middle Ages to deify womanhood and give to every picture the superscription, "Madonna and Child".

What parenthood means to a man, what potentialities it enshrines for him and for his child, is a matter of slower growth. This change is not so sweeping and sudden in fatherhood as in motherhood, but it is none the less profound.

Some observant student of life has declared: "During the first seven years of its life the parents are the abject slaves of the child.

"During the second period of seven years the child is the abject slave of its parents.

"During the third period of seven years it will be determined whether for all the rest of their days the child and the parents are to be friends or foes".

Allowing for exaggeration of statement, there is obviously much truth in this observation. The fledglings are not long in their birds' nest under the brooding wings of the parent birds. Soon they spread their pinions and fly away to find their own food and their own nests. Not so the human child. Of all God's creatures none other is so helpless and dependent for so long a period.

The power of parenthood is first of all the power of life and death over the infant child. Therefore it is most dangerous and criminal to entrust this grave responsibility to those who are unfit. To exercise this power aright, a girl should be trained for motherhood; a youth should not leap blindly into the duties of fatherhood, but have some intelligent preparation. Without this equipment it becomes a mere matter of haphazard as to whether or not the child will be brought up in health and strength to vigorous manhood or womanhood. Because of neglect and ignorance thousands of children perish every year. Yet in spite of this ignorance hundreds of thousands of children live because parents, if they are slaves to their children, are, in fact, willing slaves. Their hearts go out to the little one entrusted to their care with an eager devotion that knows no sacrifice too great, no service too exacting.

There is a certain school of artists, dramatists, novelists and essayists who belittle these services of parenthood. They foster a spirit of rebellion against the so-called narrowness of the home and the tasks it lays upon a woman and a man. State care of children is suggested; the sanctity of the marriage tie is derided; the rights of individuality and the claims of the larger interests of life are extolled.

All this is very shallow and specious reasoning. The age-long experience of mankind declares that there is in all this world no nobler, no more heart-satisfying task to which a man and woman can dedicate their lives together than is that of making a home. In the fulfillment of that task the finest qualities of manhood and womanhood are developed. The true mother who devotes herself wholeheartedly to her home and children, the father who in ardent and unremitting fidelity labors for home and wife and child, make a world for themselves transcending in interest, charm and worth all else besides For there is nothing in all the world that yields such compensations of joy, of pride and honor as those that come to parents who succeed in raising their sons and daughters through the changing periods from infancy onwards to perfect freedom and self-helpfulness.

In the second period of seven years the child is declared to be the abject slave of its parents. It is true that as the child comes out of helpless infancy it requires the most vigilant and alert attention. Not alone its physical, but also its mental and moral life are then to be made or marred forever. To develop these wisely and normally through all the difficulties and trials of childhood is a task for which father and mother will require the exercise of capabilities for which men and women should be fitly trained. The will of the child develops far more rapidly than does its reason. Temper runs away with sense. Passion leads to viciousness, wantonly and ignorantly. Therefore the unprepared parent inevitably declares that it is necessary to "break the child's will"

No more cruel and fatal method of moral training can be followed. The brutal subjection of the child's will to that of the adult, enforced through the exercise of superior physical strength and often by inflicting pain, is the first recourse of the thoughtless and incompetent. To enforce "blind obedience" is not the way to cure the blindness that refuses obedience. The child of a strong will becomes a strong man capable of initiative and independence when his will is guided and developed aright. The child of a weak will is easily swayed and misled. Therefore he needs the intelligent fostering and strengthening of his will under patient and untiring watchfulness. This is the crucial task of training. It is different with every child, for no two children are alike. It is therefore imperative that parents and teachers alike should have a clearly defined purpose in their dealing with the child. What is that purpose? What, in other words, is the aim we have in view in what we call education?

In training the body that aim is clearly to bring to their normal and healthy development all the physical powers of the child to the end of making it self-helpful, that it may know how to live properly. In the training of the mind the aim is clearly to bring to fullest development all the mental powers of the individual, that these may find self-expression, to the end that he may know how to think clearly and accurately.

In the training of the will the aim is clearly to bring into full development the power of self-control, to the end that the individual may have a well-poised and noble character.

Self-control is the master key to open the casket in which are to be found the treasures of all the virtues. He that cannot control himself cannot control others. "Ein Kaphdon Melamed", "A person with a temper is not fit to teach", is a dictum of the Jewish schools. Not to keep the child an abject slave of the parental will, but to set it free; little by little to remove the external compulsions by which we keep it from erring and to develop more and more its own power of self-control, this is the practical problem of moral training.

Precept alone can never accomplish this. Our everlasting "Don'ts" are futile. Example alone is effective. To win the child's assent in sustaining him in the efforts to do of his own free will and accord what he ought to do, is the ultimate test of power in parents and teachers. How to win that assent when the child is rebellious is the crucial test of this power.

Experience has given us some helpful guidance. I have endeavored to formulate its lessons under what might be called "Seven Golden Rules for Parents and Teachers":

First is the rule of Common Sense. That quality, though we all claim to possess it, seems to desert us in the training of children. What so common as to see the child confused and tortured by the conflicting commands of its parents. "What have you under your right arm"? asks the master of the harlequin in the play. "Orders", is the reply. "What under your left arm"? "Counter-orders". To just such distraction through "orders" and "counter-orders" do parents often subject the child. Never in its presence should parents air their differences—least of all—differences in reference to the child. Elsewhere must they thresh these out and find some definite basis of agreement.

To the appeal of common sense, which is the appeal of reason against passion, neither child nor adult can long fail to be amenable. In its presentation one must apply the second golden rule—the rule of Candor. There are definite standards of conduct which must be clearly defined. A child has a keen sense of fairness. To those standards there must be a rigid adherence on the part of both parents and child. Any weakness, any indulgence, is fatal. Threats are forever unavailing if there be even one lapse in carrying them out. Promises are worthless forever after, if there be but a single failure to fulfill them. The natural consequences of any act constitute the best reward or the best punishment. If you tell me a lie, I do not trust you. You must win back my faith, however hard this be. When you have proven worthy of one trust I am prepared to repose in you a greater trust.

Here the third golden rules comes into action—it is the rule of Good Humor. Do not quarrel with your child or enter into any discussions. This serves only to feed resentment. A simple, direct thrust is most effective. Let the shaft of your logic rather be tipped with kindly humor than barbed with bitterness. A genial nature and a sense of humor saves many a desperate situation.

Should this fail, try as your fourth expedient the Appeal to Honor. It touches the most sensitive roots of all morality. It is the speediest call to conscience. There is a responsive thrill in that summons within even the most callous. Why? Because it recognizes that back of the evil there is still some good concealed. To call out the good and help it become dominant in the child, this lies within the power of parenthood. The divine quality in the child leaps forth to kindle at the divine quality revealed in the parent. Again, it is example rather than precept that tells. Noblesse Oblige is a principle of conduct we too rarely call into action. The divinity of the gift of free-will is too rarely emphasized as a sanctifying and ennobling force. By the use of our free-will in self-mastery we exercise our most God-like power. The parent using that power stands to the child as a veritable representative of God Himself. Your firm ruling, transparent in its fairness, will constrain your child to conform his will to yours. Thus you may actualize to the child Rabban Gamaliel's dictum: "Do God's will as if it were thy will, that God may do thy will as if it were His will (Aboth 2.4)".

When the appeal to honor fails, what then? There is a fifth resort, too often used first. It is the Appeal to Shame. Ridicule is a keen blade. Sarcasm and Irony make a two-edged sword. They are dangerous to handle. Used too often, they are speedily blunted and cannot be restored. The spirit grows callous to their over-use and we cease to tingle with shame. In extreme cases of obduracy however, every moral force must be brought to bear, until obduracy yields to remorse. The stubborn youth must be made vividly conscious of what his parents, teachers, classmates, relatives and friends, his school and home, suffer by his being put to shame, but most of all must be made to realize the humiliation when his own self-respect falls because he is disgraced. Higher than self-knowledge is self-control, but highest of all is self-respect.

Such conditions will not happen and cannot recur when the Rule of Confidence has been established. Let the child grow up in an atmosphere of perfect candor and sincerity. A father and son should be the best of chums, a mother and daughter the best of comrades. Sharing in each other's interests, pleasures and pursuits, they grow so close in their intimacy that misunderstanding and rebelliousness can find no room to intervene.

We may fail in everything else, but we can never fail in that seventh and highest appeal—that of heart to heart. The ultimate secret of the power of parenthood lies in that sublime devotion which suffers all things, endures all things, sacrifices all things and yet holds fast to love.

During the difficult period of adolescence from 14 to 21 years or thereabouts, youth is struggling to find itself. It is engaged in making its adjustments to the baffling conditions of the shifting and changing world of which it is now a part. That is the time when the decision is reached as to whether the youth is to be for all the future to the parent either friend or foe. For that is the period when our mode of training comes to ripeness.

There are parents who, instead of seven golden rules, have but one rule with their children, and that is: "As a rule, give in to them". Such parents have no time to bother with their children. The mother must be off to her bridge party or the father to his club. This shameful weakness and cowardice is sure to yield them bitterness. Their pampering and self-indulgence makes of their children selfish and insufferable creatures, who are prone to despise those who have forfeited the right to be honored. No less is this true of those who follow the other extreme and treat their children with a rigor that sometimes mounts to the plane of brutal harshness. The story is, alas, too familiar of the youth or maid who runs away into the world. Left without moral supports and flung to every temptation, sweet memories of home are turned to bitterness and the love of kindred turned to ashes.

At this trying time we need the help of every agency to hold our children close to our affection. All that we can do to make home the dearest, most revered spot on earth; all that school and teachers can yield us; all that the sanctuary may give of fortifying influence we should eagerly, gladly use to bind fast the friendship of our boys and girls, that we may keep this most precious of earth's blessings while life endures, and cherish its devoted promise for eternity.

As a practical endeavor towards the attainment of that great ideal we must rear a race that shall be better, nobler than we.

Training for parenthood must be the conscious motive of the future. The past has wilfully and studiously ignored this duty. Our generation received no instructions whatever on anything that related to marriage, home-making and to child rearing. A false modesty prevailed which rendered all these subjects taboo. Grievous dangers resulted. Our homes, our schools, our churches, our communities, our cities, are at last being aroused to make provision for the proper education of the rising generation in the duties of parenthood.

My appeal is that all these opportunities may be eagerly seized upon by those who as teachers stand in loco parentis and by all upon whom in the future will devolve the duties, responsibilities and powers of parenthood.

I have felt prompted to call attention to the power, the meaning and responsibility of parenthood because there is a period coming after this war, and throughout a generation to follow, when the gravest and most difficult problems will confront the world. Our children will be called upon to engage in work of physical, political, moral and spiritual reconstruction in the affairs of mankind such as has never been required before.

The rising generation will need every quality of self-helpfulness, self-mastery and self-respect, which it is in the power of their parents and teachers to impart.

That era of reconstruction, if it is to be effective, must fulfill these ideals, which the Prophet Isaiah cherished when, with rapturous outburst, he declared, "A little child is born to us". He portrayed his vision of the great future to which mankind shall advance to that millenial age when "a little child will lead them". The little child is the embodiment of the spirit of purity, of innocence, of trust, of fairness, of friendliness, of love. When mankind follows the leading of the little child, then warfare will cease, justice will prevail and God will rule in all hearts.

RUSSIAN JEWS PLEAD CAUSE OF ROUMANIAN JEWS.

A Jewish demonstration took place in Odessa on May 16, for the purpose of protesting against the ill-treatment to which the Roumanian Jews are subjected. The Roumanian Consul in Odessa addressed the demonstration and assured the assembly that the King of Roumania promised to carry through the complete emancipation of the Jews at a very early date. A resolution was sent to Professor Milyukov, the former Minister for Foreign Affairs of Russia, and the Council of Soldiers and Workmen, begging for the intervention of Russia to secure equal rights for the Jews of Roumania.

THE KEHILLAH, XXXIII

By PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph. D.

This closing article of the series shall give a brief survey of the religious problem in modern Judaism. In the endless discussion of the present situation, and the future of the Jewish people, especially since the time that Zionism became such a prominent factor in Jewish life, the real issue of the religious problem is obscured by a cloud of vague generalities. The situation of Judaism presents a problem entirely different from other religions, because the greatest impulse for a change of religious traditions lay in the political situation.

This does not mean that the deviations from tradition were exclusively inspired by political motives. The views of Judaism were just as much influenced by the great upheaval, following in the wake of the Renaissance, as was the case in the non-Jewish world. The only difference was that the Jews being bound together by their political situation did not furnish a fertile soil for strictly religious movement. We find in the sixteenth century already some advanced thinkers who showed the necessity of reviving the creed. The matter is somewhat too technical for the average reader, but it may be elucidated by two examples. Elijah Levita (1468-1549), a German scholar who lived in Italy, embodied in an otherwise technical textbook an essay in which he declared that the vowel points were not introduced until the seventh century. This theory not merely overthrows the old belief that the books of the Bible have come down to us in exactly the same shape in which the original authors gave them to their contemporaries, but if properly developed it would have had a great influence on the Jewish creed. A passage in Ecclesiastes (3, 21) which, with the vowel points that we have, means, "Who knows the difference between the spirit of man that goeth upward and the spirit of the animal that goeth downward to the earth", would with a change of vowel points mean, "Who knows whether the spirit of man goes upward, and the spirit of animal goes downward"? The former version expresses reverence for the unknowable, the latter presents a clearly agnostic view. Similar is the case of a younger contemporary of Levita's, the Italian Azariah Dei Rossi (1511-1578) who lays down the theory that the rabbis are no authority in questions of science, but only in religious láw. Properly interpreted this doctrine was bound to lead to a change of law because any number of the dietary laws are based on scientific theories, as they were held in the Middle Ages. Still stronger is the criticism of Leon Modena (1571-1648) of Venice, on rabbinical law. He does not limit himself to a criticism of rabbinic authority on secular theories, but attacks directly some religious laws and practices, declaring that these are out of harmony with the views of his time. His ideas cannot have been solely his own property, for he was a contemporary of the rationalist Uriel Acosta, and Spinoza was born when Modena was a man of sixty-two. While such men were surely exceptional, they cannot have been without followers. We find in the beginning of the eighteenth century direct demands for a revision of the ritual of the synagogue. These attempts were not followed by practical results, but the ideas underlying them were no doubt shared by a constantly growing number.

The French Revolution brought the question to a practical issue. The entrance of the Jews into the political life of their environment resulted in an acute crisis. What was a Jewish public official to do, when the duties of his office conflicted with the laws of his religion? The most important question, however, was, how could Judaism maintain the leading idea of its ritual, which expressed itself in the synagogue service, and on all occasions when religion entered into man's life, at the initiation ceremony, wedding, funeral, and the like, when the guiding thought always was that Judaism is now in a provisional state and cannot fulfill its destiny unless it is able to establish a politically independent state in Palestine? Christian guests, invited to a Jew[illegible]al, were bound to ask themselves the question: how can people who declare that they are only temporary residents in our country, demand all the privileges of citizenship? This pressing question could not be sidetracked like the abovementioned discussion on the validity of rabbinical views on science.

[illegible] pressing was the problem of [illegible] As long as the Jew was excluded from public life, and as long as the only profession open to him was medicine, he could regard an exclusively Jewish education as the proper method for bringing up his children. Now it was different. If he was to avail himself of the opportunities furnished him by the new order of things, the education of his children had to be secularized. This once granted, the practice of the synagogue could not remain uninfluenced by the different character of the congregation. Composers like Meyerbeer were naturally exceptional cases, but the average boy and girl in a Jewish family, that was able to give its children better advantages, received some musical education. Could it be satisfied with the kind of music that it heard in the old-fashioned synagogue? Could the young man who had graduated from a law school, or who had only gone through a few years to the "Gymnasium" or the "Realschule" be satisfied with the attendance at the synagogue for a whole day on Yom Kippur, or for several hours on the holydays, when he was barely able to stagger through the prayers that he did not understand, and that in the translation bored him with their endless repetitions?

The first suggestion for meeting the problem was to make the services more attractive by better music, and by sermons delivered in correct language. This again, necessitated a secular education of the rabbis, and in this way a wide chasm opened between the older and the younger members of the profession. The unpleasantness, created by the friction of these two elements, was already experienced by Samson Hirsch, when he held the office of Landrabbiner from 1847 to 1851. It had not been overcome when Mayer Feuchtwang became rabbi of Nikolsburg in 1861. The representatives of the old school had then already decreased in numbers. Of those who remained, Reb Itzig Weinberger, and Reb Moshe Loeb Kohn, were among the most aggressive representatives. As I did not know Reb Itzig personally, I cannot add to what I have said before. He grumblingly saw the old religious traditions fade away, but at least the official management of the congregation remained the same that it had been. At the period of the great holydays, the religious life of the community was intense, the services beginning on Sunday of Rosh Hashanah week, were held before daybreak, and it did one's heart good to see men and women, old and young, come to the synagogue at four o'clock in the morning, groping their way in the dark, or to observe how domestic life in the weeks preceding Passover was dominated by the religious aspect of housecleaning, when furniture and kitchen utensils were scrubbed in front of the houses, or when in the main street of the ghetto booths were erected for the sale of household goods, that were needed for Passover. This was also a busy season for the rabbi who had to answer all sorts of questions, whether a coffee pot used during the whole year, might be used on Passover too, or how was it to be "Kashered".

These questions occupied the whole life of men like Reb Itzig, and therefore he was bound to see in a man of modern education, like Feuchtwang, who read his German classics, or studied his Aristotle in the original, a mere sham. Judaism never developed a strict dogmatic interpretation of its creed, and Reb Itzig would have found it very difficult to formulate clearly in catechism form, the reason why it was necessary for the salvation of a Jewish soul, that in an age when pretty nearly everybody possessed a watch, and every household a clock, and in addition, everyone could hear the town clock strike the hour, the mediaeval custom to be maintained that the sexton should knock at the door, to announce the beginning of the service, which would leave a number of good Jews out of the reach of these summons, as they had taken up their abodes outside of the ghetto. Reb Itzig would perhaps have been able to repeat the pun of Moses Sofer, that every innovation is prohibited, but more likely he would have delivered a vehement philippic against those who wish to overthrow the time-honored edifice of Judaism, without entering into the details of the question at all. Any formula or creed is but a weak attempt at the interpretation of people's feelings.

More decided was Reb Moshe Loeb's attitude. He was the perfect type of that opposition which feels that, come what may, we have at least no right to yield. He represented, not merely in his religious teachings, but still more in his private life, that principle of opposition, which always has expressed the ideal of conservatism. He was very unceremonious in his private life. His wife kept a small grocery store, from which a stairway, which was rather a ladder, led to the upper story, where the family had its narrow living quarters. The rabbi would often be seen in that diminutive store with his volume of the Talmud on the worm-eaten, dilapidated counter, and occasionally wait on a customer, when the "Rebbezin" was saying her prayers, or was busy in the kitchen. Such cases were not infrequent. A story that is told of Rabbi Seligmann Baer Bamberger, who before he was elected rabbi of Wuertzburg kept a store in his native village, Wiesenbronn, is quite characteristic. A customer came in the morning while the Rebbezin said her prayers, and he was poring over a difficult problem in the Talmud. The Rebbezin could not interrupt her prayers, and the rabbi rose, with a sigh, murmuring: "One might think that nobody in the village sells coffee and sugar except we." I heard the same story reported of Reb Abusch of Zerkov, the grandfather of the Honorable Nathan Barnett of Paterson, N. J., the hero of many similar anecdotes, and undoubtedly they are told elsewhere of similar characters. Reb Moshe Loeb would stand in his shirt sleeves, his bare feet in heavy slippers, in front of his house, pinch a child's cheeks as it passed by, and ask it what it had for dinner, or going home from the Beth Hamidrash in the evening, he would show the boys how he could slide on the ice, and his conversation was the complete negation of all rules of elocution. He talked in abrupt, incomplete sentences, with exclamation marks or question marks after every few words, usually pronouncing only parts of the sentence and swallowing the last syllables of the words.

An illustration, which at the same time gives a picture of religious life, is the following. Johann lived in a village of lower Austria, and came regularly for the holiday season to Nikolsburg. Just as he was sitting down for the frugal noon meal on the eve of Passover, at which neither bread nor Matzos is allowed, he exclaimed with horror, "Why I forgot to hand the key to the man to whom I sold the Chomez"! This remembrance was accompanied by a series of interjections, which expressed the deep sorrow at this bitter drop in the cup of festival joy. For the explanation of this shock, the following may be said. The law requires that nothing leavened shall be kept on the premises of a Jew during the Passover week. In order to obviate this difficulty, it is permitted to sell everything leavened to a non-Jew, from whom it may be bought back after Passover. The Passover Hagadahs, usually had a specimen of such a contract printed at the end of the book. It stipulated that Mr. A. sold everything leavened, including that which is found on the inside of vessels, all of which located in such and such room of his house, at such and such price. The buyer has the privilege of leaving the goods on the premises, for which the seller rents him the room described, for a week. The buyer gives a deposit of ten Kreuzer, but if on the day after Passover, he fails to claim the goods, and to pay the balance, the sale shall be null and void. The buyer naturally had to receive the key to the premises, and it was stipulated that he should always have free access to them, which, however, did not prohibit the seller from putting a padlock on the door. For the "Gass" at Nikolsburg, there were regular contractors for that business, appearing on the eve of Passover, signing the contract, handing ten Kreuzer as deposit, and returning on the night after the Passover with a declaration that they were unable to fulfill the contract, from which they were at once released, receiving another ten kreuzer for their trouble, when they returned the key.

Johann, who had to make this transaction with an inexperienced Chomez buyer, had in the rush of preparing to move his household, forgotten to hand the key. What was to be done? Sammy was sent to Reb Moshe Loeb, to ask his advice. Reb Moshe Loeb received him with an angry shrug of the shoulders, "Well, what's to be done, Chomez, Pesach, prohibited"! Sammy asked timidly, "Father wishes to know whether he may sell it when he comes home." "Sell it" was the answer, "not even give it away, Chomez, Pesach, osur banoah"! Sammy came home with the report. Johann was asked by the other members of the family what he was going to do. "I am going to sell it", was the answer, "am I crazy that I shall burn up stuff worth a hundred florins"? "Why did you send to the rabbi then"? the wife asked. "Well", was the answer, "could I anticipate that he was going to order me to burn it"?

In the pulpit, Reb Moshe Loeb was a little more ceremonious. He made even an attempt to approach a correct German, when he became emphatic. His great act was the official sermon on the "Great Sabbath" preceding Passover, and on the Sabbath of Penitence preceding Yom Kippur. This sermon consisted of two parts. The first was the discussion of a difficult Talmudic topic, which only a small select number of the audience could understand, who debated in a very lively manner, often so that the rabbi would beat the pulpit and say: "Be quiet a moment, give me a chance, I have something to say here, too"! The second part was a moral lesson, and on the Great Sabbath a few timely rules on the Passover laws were added. So I remember that Reb Moshe Loeb would say, "Next Tuesday will be the fair in Poisdorf. Some people may come home late, and they shall take care that they first search the house for Chomez before they say their evening prayers, or eat their supper". It may not be unnecessary to add the explanation that on the evening before the Passover feast the houses, which for weeks were cleaned, had to be searched for everything leavened, and that for that purpose a few bread crumbs were laid in corners, so that the father, going from one corner to another with a lighted wax taper, a goose wing, and a wooden spoon, should not search in vain. The crumbs swept into that primitive dustpan, were tied securely with a rag and were burned on the next morning in a great heap, for the joy of the Kehillah youth. Another lesson was, that if people kept a Christian servant, they might give her money and tell her, "If you do not like Matzos, buy yourself something else, but under no condition, say, "Buy bread", nor deposit, as some ignorant people do, bread in the house of a Christian neighbor". Of the moral lessons, I have only a dim recollection, that Reb Moshe Loeb once said, "The Torah presents to us the servant of Abraham, saying to Rebecca, (Gen. 24, 7): 'Give me to drink', which translated literally means, let me lick. Nu, wie heisst, if a man is thirsty, he doesn't want to lick, but to drink, but here we see that even the servant of Abraham expresses the Jewish idea of enjoyment of life. The Jew does not want more than what is needed to sustain life, but Esau came to Jacob and said: "Feed me" (Gen. 25, 3). He wants to be filled. "Stopp mech, fuetter mech". I also remember that at the end of a discourse, he quoted the Talmudic explanation of Leviticus 11, 44: "Sanctify yourselves". this means wash your hands before the meal. "Be ye holy" that means wash your hands after the meal, "For I am holy" this means, say grace. He admonished his hearers, that if they did not observe the ceremony of ablution after the meal, they should at least never neglect the ablution before the meal. His audience was always profoundly edified, and I remember having overheard expressions of admiration from these plain village Jews, who contrasted Reb Moshe Loeb's sound and intelligible talks with the abstruse sermons of the rabbi.

Reb Moshe Loeb had five boys. The oldest, Shmoole, was sent to a Hungarian Yeshibah, for the father would not trust him to the dangerous influences of the "Gymnasium". Shmoole came home and amused us with a number of Yeshibah jokes, that presented to us an unknown world, but he had no desire to continue the traditions of his father, and entered business. Not being successful in this, his father secured for him a position as Shochet and as such he died a few years ago at the age of some sixty. He was the last Yeshibah Bahur in the old Kehillah. Two younger sons went to the "Gymnasium", one Feiwel, officially Philip, was in the same class with me, and I met him afterwards when I took a post graduate course in Vienna, where he studied mathematics. The youngest boy, Mordchele, was then clerking in Vienna, and the father was supposed to believe that he had a position which allowed him to keep the Sabbath. It is quite possible that Reb Moshe did not care to know more than was absolutely necessary. He died May 9, 1890, at the age of sixty-four, after a protracted illness. He had been sent to Vienna for hospital treatment, but feeling that his end was approaching, he insisted that he be brought home. He wished to die in the place of his fathers, and be buried amongst them, closing a long line of Talmudic scholars, who had formed the aristocracy of the place, which had seen so many luminaries of Israel.

Centers of Jewish Learning

By
Dr. Max L. Margolis

(Written for the B'nai B'rith News)

Thoughtful Jews who are known for their interest in the advance of Jewish learning are often heard to remark that the number of institutions in this country where Jewish learning is cultivated is none too large; that barring the Cincinnati College all are situated in the East; that there ought to be more of them; that Chicago, the second largest Jewish community in the United States, should not be without its own seat of learning for Jews; that some such institution, however modest, should overlook the Golden Gate, with one more perhaps somewhere between Chicago and the Pacific Coast. It may perhaps be said that the number of students desiring to perfect themselves in Jewish lore is by no means so large as to warrant the creation of new institutions, necessitating a stupendous outlay of money and bound to draw away from the institutions already in existence what student material they have. The objection is not a valid one. The supply often creates the demand. In a large Jewish community there are always some Jewish young men and women who are eager to gain access to higher Jewish learning, but for want of a school near at hand must forego the luxury of a Jewish education. Rabbis we must have. For their training the two (now three) seminaries are sufficient. Those who for one reason or another do not find the ministry to their liking, and yet wish to become Jewish scholars, have a place where they are well taken care of. But there is a much larger class of laymen who have no thought of making Jewish learning their avocation in life and yet have a desire to catch a glimpse of it. These men and women cannot be expected to travel far away from home. The two teachers' colleges do good work in their spheres. But many more centers for the proper training of the Jewish teacher should be provided for. There are a few points, nevertheless, which must be taken into consideration.

The lesson of the past history of centers of Jewish learning reveals the fact that on the one hand they presupposed large Jewish settlements, flourishing in communities of metropolitan size and marked by affluence, and on the other hand that their location in a particular community was fortuitous, depending on the zeal and reputation of a great master. A liberal endowment committed into the hands of an executive of great organizing talent will often indeed create a great institution, as it were, overnight. The University of Chicago is a notable example. But seats of learning are more than aggregates of brick or stone, and more than an administration office, no matter how able the occupant. It is quite true that the tendency exists to treat faculties as negligible quantities. If one man departs, another is installed in his place. So long as chairs are filled, it makes no difference who the incumbent is. The president and the student body are really the two potent and necessary factors; the faculty is a necessary evil. Often enough president and student body, the forces from above and the forces from below, combine to deprive faculty members of whatever power they may desire to wield. The president must be popular with the students; and the students carry their grievances straight to the administration. Nevertheless, the fame of a seat of learning rests on the personnel of the teaching body. The students come and go; the teachers remain. In Europe students are given more to migrating. They go from university to university. Over there it is not at al necessary that every university should excel in all branches. Sometimes a small university harbors a great man, and to him the students flock from all parts of the world. With us one school is as good as another, or at least wishes to pose as such. No one can say that there is an intrinsic reason why Yale or Princeton should be preferred to Harvard or Columbia. You can study chemistry or biology or history or Semitic languages in one as well as in another. But we are in the pioneer stage. Things will be different in the future. For one thing, universities will find out that they cannot go on forever expanding, multiplying chairs. It will be a question of intensifying rather than of extension. And the best man will come to the front. And given one first-rate man, he will carry with him the rest of his colleagues. Faculties will become the central and most important factor. The executive will not overshadow the teaching force. He will be the first among his equals. He will be held less responsible for the policy of an institution. The two training schools for rabbis in this country offer good examples of the two-fold tendency which goes to locate an institution in a particular community. The New York Seminary was in its initial career presided over by a scholar from another community who, in commendable effacement of self, realized that not he, but the institution was paramount, and that the place for such an institution was New York with its large Jewish population. On the other hand, the location of the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati was a matter of accident. Had Isaac M. Wise accepted the call to New York, the college would have been erected there. He was a sort of bishop, and he had his bishop's seminary about him. Though he called others to share with him his high responsibilities, he remained the dominant power to the end of his days. In Cincinnati personality counted for everything; organization was a secondary matter. The Episcopalians are none too large a community. Yet they have their seminaries everywhere. We Jews should have our seats of learning likewise in every section of this continent. I receive quite frequently letters from all parts of the country, inquiring about the best text-book of Hebrew grammar, mostly from laymen who wish to teach themselves, sometimes also from rabbis aspiring to an academic career on the side. The demand, therefore, would amply justify multiplication.

It is not necessary at all that every institution should start out full-fledged. Cincinnati and New York had small beginnings. The Hebrew Union College was at first located in the basement of Wise's Temple. And if I am not mistaken, Wise took in any and everybody from the community who wished to get a smattering of Jewish education, and boys were there from good families who had not the least notion of devoting themselves to the ministry. We need rabbis well versed in Jewish lore. We need just as much an educated laity. The danger of concentrating Jewish spirituality in the hands of the rabbis is with us. Hence the repeated endeavors on the part of partisan rabbis to indoctrinate their hearers, to din into their ears their own pet theories. We need Jewish leaders who can think for themselves. But ignorance of Jewish history and literature does not afford the credentials for leadership. With small beginnings, great results may be accomplished. The Sunday school and the Talmud Torah are our primaries. We must build on the top of them secondary Jewish schools. At present there is a gap between the lowest and the highest. It ought to be possible for every boy and girl, born and bred in this country, to rise from the lowest to the highest. But they cannot leap over the boundary. We must not wholly depend on the immigrant who imports his lore. Not that it is not to be made use of. But if American Israel is indeed to have a character of its own, Jewish and American at one and the same time, we ought to provide for the homeborn and afford the facilities for his rising to leadership. Whether all these institutions should be united to form one big machinery is to be left to the future. There is much to be said in its favor. But on the whole we cannot introduce into this country the Prussian system, where all the higher institutions of learning form each a pigeon-hole in the ministry of education. A large foundation for the encouragement of Jewish education we need. We have the men to give the funds, we have the men who are by nature fitted to administer them. But until such a foundation exists, it is well to leave the initiative and the financing to local spheres. Chicago and New Orleans and San Francisco can well take care of themselves. In each of these communities there is enough of affluence and of learning to supply the money and the guiding spirits. Let each institution cultivate some particular branch of Jewish learning. Perhaps then our students will learn to migrate. They will go there where the best man in a particular subject is the attraction. One first rate man in each such institution is sufficient. We need very badly a Bible institute all by itself. It is immaterial where it shall be located. And so other subjects may call for specialization. Let there be many centers, individual, really great. And let them all be ready to co-operate.

Their own performance of civic duty, their diligence in industry, their charity to all men is the guarantee that the fragile walls of discrimination will fall before their onward march to increasing power and responsibility.—Editorial "Bridgeport Farmer".

Sixty-fifth Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2, I. O. B. B., at Cincinnati, Ohio

District Grand Lodge No. 2, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, held its sixty-fifth annual convention at the Hotel Gibson, Cincinnati, Ohio, on May 20, 21 and 22, with the largest attendance within the history of the district. The work of the convention, which was of a most earnest character, included a session until midnight on the evening of May 21.

By invitation of the convention, which telegraphed to Mr. Louis Marshall and Judge Julian Mack, they were expected to arrive in Cincinnati on Tuesday, these gentlemen addressed the convention on that day in furtherance of the work of American Jewish war relief. Their addresses made a deep impression upon the representatives, resulting in many voluntary contributions in large amounts and the contribution from many of the representatives and officers of the Grand Lodge of their mileage or per diem. The District Grand Lodge voted a contribution of $5,200 to the same purpose and resolved also upon the purchase of $5,000 of United States "Liberty" bonds.

On invitation, Mr. Oscar Leonard delivered an address which will appear with the printed proceedings of the convention, and there will also appear therein memorial addresses, of Brother Jacob Furth in memory of Brother Martin A. Marks, and of Brother Milton L. Anfenger in memory of Meyer Friedman.

An extended report was made by the committee which, under the authority of the 1916 convention, visited Denver and investigated the condition of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, and which committee earnestly recommended continued and increased assistance to that institution.

Brother Samuel Grabfelder, president of the Denver Hospital, being present at the convention, upon request of the convention addressed it respecting that institution, and rendered an account of his stewardship.

The thanks of the convention were tendered to Mr. Louis Marshall, Brother Julian W. Mack, Brother Oscar Leonard and Brother Samuel Grabfelder for their messages to the District Grand Lodge.

The District Grand Lodge directed the payment during the coming year of $1,500 towards the maintenance of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.; $750 in support of the Denver Sheltering Home for Children; $750 to the Central Jewish Aid Society in Denver, and $100 to the National Farm School.

The district constitution was amended so as to exempt lodges from payment of regular quarterly District Grand Lodge dues for such of its members as may join the army or navy of the United States, and it was resolved that the executive committee of the order be requested to take under consideration such action as it may deem best in connection with social service work among those enlisted in our nation's defense in this country and in Europe.

The convention unanimously, and by a rising vote, by resolution pledged loyal adherence to our country's flag and directed a copy of the resolution to be transmitted to the President of the United States.

Resolutions of appreciation of entertainments and attention shown to the representatives and visiting ladies were unanimously adopted.

The following trustees of the Endowment Fund were elected to fill vacancies:

Brother Henry Rauh of Indianapolis, Ind., for five years; Brother Frederick J. Ach of Dayton, Ohio, for three years; Brother Wm. Ornstein of Cincinnati, Ohio, for two years.

Brother Frederick Lazarus, Jr., of Columbus, Ohio, was elected as trustee of the Jewish Orphan Asylum to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of his father, Brother Frederick Lazarus, Sr.

The convention wholly disapproved of an amendment presented by the orphan asylum to Section 15 of its laws, suggesting the striking out of the word "Grand" before the word "Lodge," which amendment was made with a view of permitting the election of president, vice-president and treasurer of the General Fund of the institution, who might not be members of a District Grand Lodge, and which change the convention opposed.

The election resulted as follows:

President—Louis J. Borinstein, Indianapolis, Ind.

First Vice-President—Jos. Seligman, Louisville, Ky.

Second Vice-President—Sidney G. Kusworm, Dayton, Ohio.

Secretary—Victor Abraham, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Treasurer—Wm. Ornstein, Cincinnati, Ohio.

General Committee—Edward C. Schanfarber, Columbus, Ohio; David Alexander, Toledo, Ohio; Joseph Stampfer, St. Louis, Mo.; Adolph Biccard, Indianapolis, Ind.; Alfred A. Benesch, Cleveland, Ohio; Harry J. Levi, Cincinnati, Ohio.

District Court—Alfred M. Cohen, Cincinnati, Ohio; A. B. Frey, St. Louis, Mo.; Isaac Goodman, Terre Haute, Ind.; Arthur L. Friedman, Denver, Colo.; Shepherd R. Evans, St. Louis, Mo.

A committee consisting of Harry Levison, chairman; Milton L. Anfenger, Samuel Rosenfield, A. L. Levi and Alfred A. Benesch, being a Committee on Resolutions, presented a report which was unanimously adopted by a rising vote expressing thanks to Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, to the city of Cincinnati, to the local convention committee and particularly its chairman, Brother Alfred M. Cohen, and to Mrs. Bernard Freiberg, chairman of the Ladies' Arrangement Committee, for the wonderful hospitality extended to the delegates and their ladies and for the comfort, pleasure and inspiration that was afforded them during their stay at the convention. Thanks were also expressed to the American Israelite and to the Cincinnati press for the publicity accorded the convention; to the retiring officers of the District Grand Lodge for the success of the closing administration and to Brother Joseph H. Levy for the warmth of his reception.

The committee further recommended, and it was unanimously adopted, that the general committee present to the retiring president, Mr. Karl.M. Vetsburg, an appropriate testimonial in appreciation of his ardor in the work of the order and in recognition of his personification of the ideals of our fraternity.

ENGLISH JEWS PROTEST.

Vigorous protests of prominent English Jews against the action of the Conjoint Committee of London, which last week went on record as opposing the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, have appeared in the London "Times" this week. The names of the protestants include Lord Rothschild, Chief Rabbi Hertz, Elkan Adler, who resigned from the Conjoint Committee because of its stand against Zionism, Dr. Gaster, Dr. Weizman, and a number of other leaders in English Jewry.

SOCIAL SERVICE WORK IN DISTRICT NO. 1.

The Social Service Department of District No. 1 is progressing very satisfactorily, thanks to the splendid men who are giving President Rosenzweig, Bros. Dr. Herbert S. Goldstein and Ely Rosenberg and the rest of the Social Service Committee their hearty support. Bro. Secretary Bernard M. Kaplan and Bro. Myer L. Victorius, in their recent visit to Patchogue, secured the promises of five families to look after nine dependent children, for the transfer of whom, arrangements are now being made with the Children's Court. Bro. Harry Weiss, undertook to take care of two children himself, and is trying to find homes for more dependent children.

A CULTURAL CONFERENCE AT WARSAW.

A Jewish cultural conference has been held at Warsaw, in which a hundred and fifty delegates from eighty Polish towns participated. The question which caused most discussion was the place of Hebrew in the curriculum of Jewish schools. Finally a large majority decided that Hebrew must figure prominently in the curriculum as an obligatory subject. The choice of an Educational Council for the Jewish state schools, as well as the future of the Jewish theater and Jewish music, also engaged the attention of the conference.

SPAIN WELCOMES REFUGEES.

According to letters received in this country from the Committee for Relief of Jewish Refugees in Spain, that country, moved by the urgency of the need of the refugees, has welcomed the Jew again to her cities and afforded asylum to them after 400 years of exile.

Many Jewish artisans, it is learned, have been enabled by small loans to go into business in the Spanish cities, and there is a gradual flow of the Jews from Barcelona to other parts of the country, where they are settling.

There seems to be little doubt according to Jewish leaders in this country, that after the war there will be considerable immigration of Jews into Spain.

FANNING THE SPARK DIVINE

By OSCAR LEONARD

Superintendent Jewish Educational and Charitable Association, St. Louis

Address delivered at the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2, I. O. B. B., Cincinnati, Ohio, May 21, 1917

With the awakening of the social conscience there has come a passion for social service. We Jews understand this passion for human service. The faith of our fathers has ever rested upon the ideal of loving God by serving man. Shimen ha Zadick, who lived about three hundred years before the Christian era, said: "Upon three things the world rests: upon the Torah, the service and deeds of loving kindness".

This ideal of "Gemilath Chasudim" is the keynote of the great Order B'nai B'rith, of which our District Grand Lodge is an integral part. In the many decades of its life it has been father to the fatherless, protector of the widow, guide to the stranger, has offered shelter to the weary wanderer, has given bread to the hungry and water to the parched. It has visited the sick and has nursed them back to health.

It is to the everlasting glory of our District Grand Lodge No. 2 that newer ways of service were pointed out. It is to the credit of our order that it grasped the opportunity and engaged in these newer ways of service. In 1913 President Harry Simon appointed the first social service committee of the district. No other district had such committees. He was not only wise in starting pioneer work, but he showed great acumen in his choice of Brother Jacob Billikopf as head of the committee. In Brother Billikopf he found a man of vision, broad sympathies, and indefatigable energy. The committee had hardly been at work two years when our order at its San Francisco convention, on recommendation of President Kraus, established a social service bureau to carry on work along nationwide lines.

Our District Grand Lodge has a right to its pardonable pride in having pointed the way not only for other district lodges to follow, but for the order as a whole.

Let me say that the work along thes lines has barely been started by the B'na B'rith. It is as naught to what we hop to do. The great world crisis is creating new opportunities for service here and abroad. When the great struggle is over, when hate draws back its ugly fangs and humanity asserts itself once more in this sad world of ours, there will be greater opportunities for service than the world has ever seen. There will be homes and livelihoods to restore, wound to heal, tears to dry, nightmares to dispel Many loved ones will have gone and the living will have to supply the tenderness which the bereaved mothers and father and children and wives and sisters and brothers will miss so sorely. Materia rehabilitation alone will not suffice. We shall not give bread alone. By that time our unfortunate people will have learned to live on very little bread. They will need the heart of the giver even more than his gift. The B'nai B'rith is after all the one large international organization in Jewry with no axes to grind. It engages in no partisan or political fights. It is not the exclusive property of the Reform or Orthodox Jews. It is not of the German Jews or the Russian Jews It does not cater to the rich Jews alone nor the poor Jews alone. It makes no appeal to this or that class, this or that ism. It does not stand with the conservative or the radical element in Jewry Like a mother it is with and for all her children. The B'nai B'rith welcomes, and contains within itself, all manner of Jews all factions, all classes, all parties. The Order B'nai B'rith is a Jewish body pure and simple The only condition for admission into its all-embracing fraternity is the Jewish heart. Its one question is "Are you a Jew"? It does not ask from those who come into its fold as to class affiliation income or size of bank account "Are you a Jew"? it asks. "If yes, enter, you are welcome".

For this reason the Order B'nai B'rith will be in position to do truly constructive work when the war is over All Jews will need deeds of loving kindness. This all-embracing order will be in position through its world-wide connections, to render this service This need only be touched in passing at this time, just to give us new vision and new courage in this hour of crisis Before that time comes we have work to do here and now.

Those of us who live in large cities may ask "Is not every Jewish community already organized for social service"? [illegible] our charities, our hospitals, our [illegible] alliances, our homes for children, [illegible] Brothers and a number of [illegible] organizations all trying to help the [illegible] we have these and more In fact, so many are the agencies trying to help the Jewish poor that some of us are in mortal fear the poor will be smothered with kindness, and we Jewish social workers will lose our jobs. I imagine there are times when our poor pray to the good Lord to rescue them from their friends and allow them to struggle with their poverty.

We have developed in the larger Jewish communities wonderful organizations for human service. Our people are liberal. We lo not always realize how liberal they are until we look over the subscription lists of non-Jewish charitable agencies and make invidious comparisons, only in this instance all the envy is on the other side. But there are neglected zones even in Jewish social endeavor. As a Jewish social worker, I am frank to admit it. We are trying to remedy such conditions where we find them. One of these neglected zones is the Jewish prisoner. Woe unto the Jew who commits an offense which sends him behind prison bars. There he is invariably forgotten. I always thought that prisons are the places forgotten by God. Among non-Jews, man, at least, does not forget the prisoners. We Jews have been guilty of neglect in this respect. The excuse that few Jews are found in penal institutions is not a valid one. If one Jew is in prison, that one Jew should not be forgotten. For the sake of ten righteous men, our Scriptures tell us, God was willing to save a wicked city. I interpret it to mean the supposition was that ten righteous men could make an entire city righteous. Why cannot an entire community set itself to the task of bringing one wicked man to the path of righteousness?

In May, 1912, the following editorial appeared in "The Jewish Voice" of St. Louis: "We protest against the cruel and barbarous action of the warden of the state penitentiary who, we are informed authoritatively, imposed a severe chastisement upon two Jews, one about 65 years of age, and another somewhat younger, for refusing to work on Yom Kippur, the holiest day of the Synagogue."

Can you imagine Christian prisoners being punished for refusing to work on Christmas or some other important holiday? Yet I know of no Christian holiday which means to the Christian what Yom Kippur means to the Jew. The most righteous among us fast and pray for forgiveness. Even our Zadikim are ready to atone on that day of days. Here are men feeling their unworthiness, feeling they have transgressed, branded before the world, the great day when all Israel is seeking atonement comes with its message of awe and perhaps final hope. Within the hearts of these men the Jewish spark flames up. They cannot go to the synagogue to pour out their broken hearts before the Maker of Heaven and Earth and ask for the mercy which mortal man cannot give. They want to abstain from laboring on the Sabbath of Sabbaths, to remain in their dreary cells and contemplate, pray in their awkward way, hoping that the prayers of their heavy-laden hearts would reach the gates of heaven. The warden forbids and sends them to their tasks or threatens them with the lash. Truly,

> "The vilest deeds, like poison weeds,
>   Bloom well in prison air;
> It is only what is good in man
>   That wastes and withers these;
> Pale Anguish keeps the heavy gate,
>   And the warder is Despair."

That brief editorial brought me to the realization that there are Jewish prisoners and that somebody was neglecting his duty. I wrote to the warden, informing him when our Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur would occur that year and what these days mean to us Jews. I asked that Jewish prisoners be excused from work on those sacred days. My suggestion was carried out and in September the same year the same paper was happy to inform its readers that the Jewish prisoners in the Missouri penitentiary would be excused from work.

It then occurred to me that this was not enough I visited the prison. I found at the time some twenty Jewish prisoners out of a total of over twenty-five hundred. They were happy to see me. They said I was the first Jew to come to them. I became interested in a young man who had been sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment for killing a man during a fit of jealousy. He was a mere boy when he had committed the crime He had never come in conflict with the law before and was rather a quiet person. I began to work on his case, appeared repeatedly in Jefferson City before the board of paroles, and finally succeeded in getting him paroled after he had served only seven years.

When he came to St. Louis I was deeply touched when a Ben Brith offered this poor outcast a home. I tell you it reinforced my faith in humanity, and even more so in womanity, when the fine, modest little wife of this Ben Brith opened her home so readily and accepted this man who was a stranger to her. Her hospitality was even like unto the hospitality of our mother Sarah, only in this case the hostess was an angel. She sat him at the family board with her own children. She treated him as if he were the most welcome and honored guest. When it seemed best to send him to his sister in Philadelphia, she offered to pay half of the transportation. Four years have elapsed; the young man is in the City of Brotherly Love, working, making good. Every Rosh Hashona I receive his "Leshunu Tovo" card, which I prize greatly.

My going and coming to Jefferson City resulted in a better understanding of the Jewish prisoners by the authorities. The following year for the first time in the history of Missouri there were religious services on Rosh Hashona and Yom Kippur. It was a fine piece of co-operation between the social service committee of District No. 2, the Union of Hebrew Congregations and the Missouri lodge. Brother Abe Levy of St. Louis was chosen to conduct the service. There has been a service every year for the fall holidays after that. Last Passover for the first time in the history of Missouri we had a Seder service; each Jewish prisoner received a bundle of matzoth, some kosher sausage, oranges, apples, etc.

Just picture for yourself, if you can, what the Seder service means to these men whose lives are filled with drudgery, sordidness, unattractive labor, no recreation, no spiritual influences of any kind. Here comes the Seder service, with its message of freedom, its reminiscences of childhood with all its meaning. Can you not see the men forming a new resolve to make good, to take a new hold, for the sake of those who had sat around the festive board in their childhood; for the sake of the mother whose hopes were centered in her boy; for the father who lived in his son?

In doing this work we do not wish to encroach upon the activities of the Union of Hebrew Congregations. On the contrary, we are ready to cooperate with Brother George Zeppin, who at all times responds most readily and generously. I am laying stress on this work because with it as a basis we began the welfare work we are now doing among prisoners. Brother Jashenosky of Columbus is doing much better work in this respect, for he conducts services for the prisoners in the Ohio penitentiary every Saturday and on all Jewish holidays.

Brother Meyer of Columbus has been doing fine work in the various Ohio institutions.

Brother Strull reports the glad tidings that there is not a Jew in the Kentucky penitentiaries. During the year a Jewish boy from Nashville committed some trivial offense and was sent to the penitentiary in Eddyville. I guess they wanted to have at least one Jew there. After careful investigation of the case, Brother Strull decided that the boy could serve society better on the outside than behind prison bars. He appealed to the governor and obtained a parole. Now the boy, who had stolen less than $10 worth of goods, and who in his ignorance pleaded guilty of house breaking, for which he was to serve two years, is at work supporting his aged mother. Brother Strull writes that the Big Brother committee of Nashville co-operated in obtaining the job and in the supervision of the boy.

In Leavenworth, Seder services were held in both the federal and military prisons under the auspices of the local lodge and with the co-operation of the prison authorities. Let me say, too, that Brother Billikopf and I were the first Jews to visit the military prison, after obtaining the necessary permission from the Government in Washington. We found at that time twenty Jewish boys and spoke to them, offering to help them. We obtained addresses, communicated with relatives and friends, and subsequently aided some of them in getting back to their homes.

From Cleveland, Brother Benesch reports, all Jewish boys appearing in the juvenile court are paroled to him, as are also Jewish men from the state penitentiary. In the years he has handled those coming from the industrial school, reformatory and penitentiary, only one has proved incorrigible. A Jewish man paroled to Brother Benesch last September is now at work as traveling salesman, earning $5,000 a year. Some of the boys he has handled are now holding positions of trust and responsibility.

Brother Samuel Kaufman of Indianapolis is looking after all social service work in the state institutions. Rabbi Reinhart of Gary is co-operating with the committee, making frequent visits to the state penitentiary, where he has done good work in rehabilitation. After one of his visits to the penitentiary, Brother Kaufman received a letter from a Jewish prisoner in which these lines occur: "If you knew what good you did to me since I have been in here you would know you accomplished what in years my father and I have never been able to do for myself". He goes on to tell how he was stirred to think of his past and to find that with the aid of real friendship he would have been kept from slipping, and concludes: "I am determined that I shall not go to waste, but that you can feel that you have made a new man of a man who was on the verge of self-destruction".

While in Toledo last year, Brother Coffee, in co-operation with Brother Levinson and Rabbi Alexander, succeeded in rescuing two Jewish boys from being sentenced for the murder of a man who had been killed by falling off a train on which these boys and the dead man had stolen a ride. Being friendless, the boys were held for murder. When the facts were gathered and placed before the grand jury the boys were discharged. Brother Coffee reports the boys are at work in Chicago, making good.

I am stressing this work so much because it is pioneer effort and because it is both important and neglected among us. Also because the man behind prison bars is the most helpless of creatures. Unless he knows that there are friends ready to help him, he becomes hopeless. Every time I visit a penal institution I cannot help thinking of the lines written by that English genius, Oscar Wilde, while in prison:

> "I know not whether laws be right
>   Or whether laws be wrong;
> But this we know who lie in j
>   That the wall is strong;
> And that each day is like a year,
>   A year whose days are long.
> 'But this I know, that every law
>   That men have made for man,
> Since first man took his brother's life,
>   And the sad world began,
> But straws the wheat and saves the chaff
>   With a most evil fan".

There are nearly nine thousand B'nai B'rith members in our district. I want every one of them to be ready to help save the wheat, do some human conservation, some Jewish conservation of the fine human material that wastes in our prisons. I want every Ben Brith to be ready to give employment to a released Jewish prisoner, to befriend him, to help lead him to the right path. The members of the social service committee alone cannot do it. They must have the entire membership with them in this work. Let us solemnly pledge ourselves to be eyes to the blind, a staff to the weary, and guide to the stumbling.

Our Big Brother movement I need lay no stress on. Brother Coffee has visited communities from coast to coast, and brought the message and demonstrated the need. There are Big Brother organizations in most Jewish communities now. In Denver, in addition to the usual work, the B. B. (which means B'nai B'rith as well as Big Brother) have organized a boys' indoor and outdoor club for the purpose of doing both preventive and constructive work. In St. Louis similar work is carried on under joint auspices of the B'nai B'rith lodges and the Jewish Educational and Charitable Association.

When I asked Brother Seelenfreund for suggestions as to work for this committee, he suggested that we stress Americanization. He is right. At this time of crisis in our national life it is more important than ever that our lodges engage in Americanization work. If success is to be met here, the work must be done from the proper angle. We must start not by pitying the Jewish immigrant, nor by doing things for him. The Jewish immigrant is too proud and respectable to want things done for him. He shuns those who pity him. Sholem Alechem said that you can only help people if you love them and not if you pity them. Let our brotherly love flow out abundantly

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, May 15, 1917.

The war naturally continues to dominate all communal activity in Anglo-Jewry. The number of Jewish officers is increasing, and the growing addition to the Jewish chaplains at the front is evidence enough that members of the community with the forces form a considerable body. Nor are they limited to the United Kingdom. Canada, Australia and New Zealand are well represented, and the navy no less than the army has its Jews. It is obviously impossible for any of the belligerents to publish any set of figures about its forces that may give to the enemy the least basis for calculation. But steps ought certainly to be taken for the preparation of an exact record when the war is over of the number of Jews in the army. Judging from one's everyday experience, it is clear that the Jews have contributed their fair share, and more, to furnish men to the forces of the empire.

That there have also been losses goe without saying. The community has lost some of its most promising young men, among them Denzil Myer, who deserves a niche all to himself. Like Harry Lewis, Denzil Myer devoted himself heart and soul to the East End. Harry Lewis took the whole of East End life as his province; Denzil Myer worked among its young people. There are streets and streets in Stepney where the name of Denzil Myer brings to the face a smile that has roots in the heart. The people, and the children more especially, loved Denzil Myer. He was an essentially lovable person. The Brady Street Club for Working Lads was the first sphere of his activities, and before very long, when a club was also wanted in Stepney, Denzil Myer became its leader, guide and friend. The club touched the Jewish school in Stepney, and the school touched the synagogue. Myer was at home in all three. Of the school he was the official correspondent and a member of the committee; and it is not too much to say that he knew pretty well every child in the building. To the welfare of those children Denzil Myer gave up the whole of his leisure. After a long day in the city, he would proceed to Stepney straight from the business, on every evening in the week, Friday alone excepted. You would find him at the club on Saturday and Sunday evening, too, and during the day on Sunday he was either superintending football or cricket or drilling the Stepney company of the Jewish Lads' Brigade. Nothing was too much for him, and his genial smile and cheery optimism were catching. We well remember meeting him shortly before he received his commission, and while he was exceedingly sorry to leave Stepney, he felt that duty called him to join the army. In a very real sense his loss is indeed great for Anglo-Jewry. He was the noblest type of many of our young men, whose ideal of social service deserves every praise.

Critics may say that these young men stood somewhat aside from the great world problems, and especially from the Jewish problem. Perhaps the critics are right. But it must be remembered on the other hand that the band of social workers we have in view were so engrossed in the work before them that they had little time, and perhaps less inclination, to survey the larger questions of Jewry. It was not that they avoided them; it was only that the appeal to them touched a more local, a more immediate chord. They knew the English public school ideal; they valued what it brought; and they were anxious to impart it to their fellow Jews in the East End. In their own limited spheres they did excellent work, and Anglo-Jewry is very much the poorer by the loss of those whose memory alone remains. Of the names that adorn the roll of honor, that of Denzil Myer will long recall sweet memories to those who knew him.

At a time when so many young lives are being quickly and tragically ended, the death of an old man hardly calls for comment, unless he be specially distinguished in some way or another. Therefore, when the Jewish community of Manchester was moved to take note of the demise of Isidor Frankenburg, alderman and at one time mayor of Salford, there must have been good reason for it. Isidor Frankenburg was one of those Jews who may be found in almost every country in western Europe and America —hard-working, respectable, ready to serve his fellows, ambitious, a good father, a zealous citizen. There are stories still current of how in their early days Isidor Frankenburg and his wife lived in the slum area of Red Bank, in Manchester, working hard from early morn till late at night, striving to bring up a large family decently. When he died Frankenburg had been mayor of Salford for a long period, and he was one of the largest employers of labor in the borough. From close on the poverty line he rose to be a local celebrity; and once again his life demonstrates of what the average Jew is capable. Give him scope, and he will rise to distinction among his fellows; for he has within him the makings of a good citizen.

Both Denzil Myer and Isidor Frankenburg are two well marked types of English Jews. But both belong rather to the past than to the future. The present generation is interested more in the larger Jewish problems than in merely local affairs. Perhaps it is the trend of public opinion. Certain it is that of late the great Jewish problems, such as the destiny of the Jew and the development of Judaism, have loomed large on the horizon. A great number of Jews at the universities were attracted by these problems, and it is a fact worth noting that the Zionist movement in England counts very many of our university graduates among its supporters. It may be that the senile decay into which the so-called leaders of Anglo-Jewry appear to have sunk frightened off the fresh spirits from the universities. They found no definite policy among these leaders or, at any rate, a secretiveness and distrust of public opinion worthy of the best traditions of Prussian autocracy. They found but little welcome into the charmed circle, which, like most autocracies, regarded itself as being very select. Is it any wonder that the more democratic movement of the Zionists attracted them? Even if the Zionist program be looked upon as wrong, at any rate there was a program. And today, when the war has brought an upheaval into the public life of the world, these young men are reaping their reward in the interest shown by public opinion at large in their aspirations. The road is not easy. But the Zionists know what they desire; and when the Czechs and the Poles claim national recognition, why should not the Jews, whose history dates back for centuries before the beginning of either Czechs or Poles? Public opinion in England is giving evidence of being alive to the importance of the larger Jewish problem, and when an imperial conference regards the British Empire as a political entity comprising many self-contained units, all working in common, all striving for the realization of human freedom and the advancement of material and moral progress, then surely the Zionist has a right to hope. The time is big with promise. Like the Czechs and the Poles, the Zionists in England engage in propaganda for educating public opinion. They have just issued a new monthly—"The Zionist Review"—which would do credit to any movement. It shows once more that there is room for another Jewish paper in this country.

Meanwhile, in face of all the great events of the war—the Russian revolution, President Wilson's great address, the entry of the United States on the side of the Allies, the war itself—what does the London Community in its corporate capacity do? It holds synagogue elections. No doubt it is necessary to choose the fathers of the synagogues and elect committeemen for the management of synagogue affairs. The elections and the general meetings following them offered an excellent opportunity for expressing satisfaction at some of the world-stirring events of the times in which we live. Only here and there was anything touched upon that was strictly outside the scope of the meetings. Not that the people were without interest in the big affairs. The institution showed that it was lifeless. The truth is that the synagogue in England is no longer the center of Jewish life.

Outside the synagogue Jewish activities give signs of anything but decay. At the Royal Academy exhibition of pictures, for example, Jewish artists are well represented, including a brother of our own order, Mr. Pillichowski, who once more shows one aspect of Jewish life. Of course, Mr. Solomon J. Solomon, himself a Royal Academician, has as usual a number of portraits, one of which is that of the late Albert H. Jessel. Mr. Frank Emanuel, Mr. Isaac Snowman and several other Jewish artists likewise have exhibits.

Or take the London Lodge. The practice commenced last year of inviting prominent speakers to address the members on some topic of Jewish interest has been continued this year. Brother Sokolow dealt with the revolution in Russia and its probable effect on the Russian Jews; Mr. Hermann Landau developed his scheme for the Jewish colonization of Mesopotamia, which when properly irrigated would in his opinion blossom into a Garden of Eden; and for the next meeting of the lodge, Commander Wedgwood, a member of Parliament, is announced to speak on the Jewish problem with special reference to Palestine. Visitors, including ladies, are invited to these addresses, which are given after the conclusion of the business of the lodge.

Or take a third instance. In 1793, Richard Cumberland, a literary man of his time, produced a play at Drury Lane, entitled "The Jew". The play was an attempt to portray not the typical stage Jew, but the Jew more like the real human being that he is. Mr. Louis Zangwill read a most delightful paper on Cumberland before the Jewish Historical Society of England, in the transactions of which (Vol. 7) it may be found. An attempt was made quite recently to revive the play in aid of the fund for the relief of the Jewish victims of the war in Russia; and the promoters of the idea, Mr. and Mrs. Landau, were rewarded for their efforts by its success.

The action of the University of Cambridge in regard to a small matter of Jewish interest deserves to be recorded. Cambridge has always had a strong current of liberalism in its midst, and it has certainly been fortunate in its Jewish teachers and Jewish students. Recently a wealthy lady left the university one thousand pounds (say five thousand dollars) for a prize or scholarship for the advancement of the teaching of Arabic. One of the conditions attached to the gift was that it should be used for the benefit of graduates of the university born in the United Kingdom and not being Jews. The council of the senate of the university did not feel justified in recommending the senate to accept and administer a bequest under these conditions, and have accordingly decided that the bequest be declined. One cannot help applauding this action, not from the point of view of Jews, but quite generally. In an epoch when the greater part of the world is fighting for human right and liberty, it is a fine thing to practice what is so constantly preached. A university's business is to advance learning, and any shackles that hem its activities are to be rejected. Besides, from the narrower point of view, if Frenchmen and Serbians, Boers and Canadians, Hindoos and Maories, most of them born in the United Kingdom, are fighting the common battle of liberty, in which the Jews, too, are admittedly doing their fair share, why should all these categories be excluded from enjoying the benefit of a public foundation for the extension of any branch of human knowledge? These limitations hail from a period which the war has closed.

While the hopes centered in Palestine are rosy in hue, the news that comes from there is black. It is reported that the Turks have threatened to deal with the Jews as they have dealt with the Armenians, and what is worse, they have proceeded to carry out their threats. Murder and spoilation and worse have fallen upon the Jewish inhabitants of the land, and unless the German allies of the Turk restrain them from further action, the prospect is gloomy. As long as the United States was listened to in Constantinople, these terrors would scarcely have become realities. Today it is hardly possible that public opinion will restrain the hand of the Turk. It will be interesting to observe what Germany does. So far as the Jews are concerned, it looks as if they have not suffered sufficiently. To Galicia, Poland, Lithuania and Rumania must now be added Palestine, where the work of two decades is threatened with dire destruction. It is hard to be optimistic. But Rabbi Akiba would have had us say, "Gam zu letobah". Though Browning coined the phrase, it is pure Jewish doctrine—"God's in His Heaven, all's right with the world".

The reveries of even the wise man will make him stronger for his work; his dreaming as well as his thinking will make him sorry for past failures and hopeful for future success.—Geo. Macdonald.

to the Jewish immigrant, whose life is broken, who has to begin over again, who has to form new habits and establish new moorings. Let us be a tower of strength unto him, teach him the language of our land, its customs, its ideals. There are some forty-three lodges in our district. Every one of these lodges should be a nucleus for social service, particularly the lodges in the smaller communities. They should take the lead in organizing the social endeavor in their cities. They should establish night schools, if there are none, and should stand in the forefront of all betterment movements.

Let us remember that benevolence, brotherly love and harmony are not to be mere phrases to be used on stationery, or repeated in the solemnity of our ritual. They are to be living forces driving us on in the march for a better world. In the words of the immortal Leo N. Levy, "Ours is an army organized to war on sorrow ignorance and immorality. The recruits are offered no glittering rewards. It is a service of love, duty and sacrifice". Those who enlist in this army whose weapons are love, whose arsenal is the heart, whose goal is a better world, must be ready to give not only the money tax, but life. Social service, it has been well said, demands both your money and your life. It cannot succeed without either. It is doomed to failure where only money is given and life, as expressed in personal service, is withheld. My closing plea to you then is that you give yourselves readily to this work of human betterment; that you "do justly"; that you stop to think of

"Those within the desert places—
The dull, the strange, the erring in all lands;
Who face the future with despairing faces,
And stretch forth pleading, unavailing hands.

"The heirs of poverty, the slaves of weakness,
The arrogant who will not heed commands;
The spiritless who wear a coward's meekness,
The desperate who spill life's creeping sands.

"Oh! holders of the prized and vantage places,
Oh! sharers of the peaceful, happy days,
Oh! scions of the wise and favored races,
Oh! revelers along the sunny ways—

"I beg a moment's pause, with earnest faces,
That common blood and fatherland demands;
A prayer for those that in the dreary places,
Who stretch forth pleading, unavailing hands".

Mindful of the blessings which we enjoy in common with our fellow citizens, let us, with loyal hearts, be ever devoted to our land of civil and religious liberty.

Next unto the duties which we owe to Him to whom we bow in reverence is the duty which we, as citizens of a free land, owe to that government wherein our rights are established and our liberties made secure.

ISRAEL AND DEMOCRACY.

The greatest word in the world today is democracy. Said President Wilson, when addessing Congress on April 2nd: "The World must be made safe for democracy." Most people imagine that democracy was born in Greece, for the very word is of Greek origin, and Athens was supposed to be the most democratic city in the world. As Jews, proud of our heritage, we know better. A thousand years before Athens, with its 20,000 free men and 400,000 slaves, the children of Israel lived under as democratic a form of government as ever existed. The whole origin of our national life goes back to this fundamental thought of democracy. Why were the children of Israel released from Egyptian bondage if not to make them free? Why were the ten Commandments given in the Wilderness? Israel would have chosen to receive them within its own borders, in the Holy Land. God gave these holy words in the desert, no man's land, to intensify that these commands were for all mankind. When the people of Israel wished to honor Moses, they did not call him King, but Moshe Rabbenu, Moses our teacher. Democracy is opposed to royal rule. When the children of Israel, in their weakness, asked for a king, Saul was selected. So lightly did his rule rest on the people, that the Israelites followed a shepherd youth, David, as his successor instead of Saul's own son. When Rehoboam taxed the people unduly the men of Israel revolted and formed another kingdom. A royal head never was essential to the government of Israel.

Thus our people has ever taught the world. Let the New Testament emphasize the rule of aristocracy, the Old Testament teaches the rule of all the people. The revelation on Mount Sinai broke down the Egyptian distinction between priest and layman, for Israel was declared to be a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation." Let Jesus advice to render unto Caesar what belongs to Caesar. The old Testament will plead for the rule of God through all His servants. When the children of Israel would crown Gideon after his signal victory of the Midianites, the distinguished judge replied "I will not rule over you, nor will my son rule over you. The Lord will rule over you" (Judges [illegible]). Tradition says that when [illegible] was invited to become king [illegible] Tom Paine called this Bible [illegible] attention of the Father of our country, and determined his wavering mind against royal rule.

The democracy we possess in America traces directly back to the Old Testament and the history of Israel. After King Henry VIII broke with the Church of Rome, he organized his own Church in England. When people questioned his authority to act in so arbitrary a manner, he ordered the clergymen of his country to preach from New Testament texts showing that the king can do no wrong. Many passages can be quoted to sustain that view, as "Submit to the power, for he is the anointed of God" (Peter II-13). To the authority of the New Testament, these brave English pioneers opposed the pages of the Old Testament where royal rule was never extolled, democracy was. For conscience' sake, these men finally came to America, and for twenty-three years the laws of Moses ruled in the colonies.

Today, when democracy is fighting its greatest battle, again must Israel take the lead. "Nations shall walk in thy light" (Isaiah IX-3) is true at this hour. We see a triumphant democracy ruling Israel. For years, our Jewish people in America have been living amid bitter strife and dissention. Orthodoxy or reform, Zionism or anti-Zionism, assimilation or nationalism, were mooted points of controversy. Today, we see Israel united and struggling for democracy. All forces have subordinated their personal differences and are joined to elect delegates to the Congress in September. Men and women may vote, for all members of the house of Israel are included. This Congress will meet for what? For democracy. We wish Jews in all lands to enjoy the blessings of democracy. America may be the teacher of mankind, but Israel is the leaven within America to prepare America and instruct its citizens in this holy mission. As the Jews are cementing their ranks, as never before in history, so may all religions end their petty differences and strive for the glory of God, not the man-made theologies of the past. As Israel honors God through a finer interpretation of brother love, so may all creeds learn the fundamental thought of worshipping God through love of man.

Israel is the bearer of God's choice gift, democracy. Israel has kept this light glowing through the ages, when kings and princes held temporal sway. Now that government of the people, by the people and for the people is the great aim of this world war, let Israel stand foremost in emphasizing the duty of the hour. We plead with every Israelite to join hands with all other fellow members of our faith. This is not the hour for emphasizing differences, but for strengthening our agreements. God grant that the Congress whose delegates have this month been chosen, may herald the newer age, the era of democracy.

ELEMENTAL FORCES.

The conventional life of civilization is often contrasted with the state of nature in which primitive man lived, to the disparagement of the former. The recoil from the unnatural extravagances of supercivilization is intelligible enough, but the cry for a return to nature rests as often on false premises. It is not the only part of the romanticism of the latter days of the eighteenth century that the nineteenth has destroyed. Rustic and rude need not be synonymous, and no matter how primitive the social aggregation in horde or community, some sort of a curb is immediately introduced upon the elemental forces. Civilization, it is true, as the name indicates, is of the city. From it emanate the influences which extend to the remotest hamlet. City men learn to be civil, urban. A certain suavity of manner accompanies their action and their speech. In the jostling crowd men accustom themselves to thread their way without stepping on other peoples' shoes and without having their own trodden on. There is give and take in city life as contrasted with the self-sufficiency of the hermit. If we offend, we seek pardon; if we want anything to which we deem ourselves entitled, we ask for it by the leave of our neighbor. Now all this has been the outgrowth of ages. It may be true that after all civilization is but a veneer hiding the ugly visage of savagery beneath. It may be that it is often skin-deep. But even this shallow depth has its great social value. We cannot turn our attention to the weightier things of the spirit unless our bodily wants have been satisfied. Where the struggle for daily sustenance obtains there is no room for gentility or gentleness. In leisure the gentleman is reared. Necessity knows no law; necessity is lawless. But lawlessness is savagery.

Pacifism of the weak-kneed variety is despicable. It is often the cloak for craven submissiveness, for indolence. The fighting spirit which makes the red blood to tingle is a virtue. But war at best is a necessity. War is ruthless. There is no halting once the step is taken. No halfway measures will avail. The battle must be fought to a finish. But let us remember the consequences. In the soldier's life there is no "I beg your pardon" and "By your leave, sir". The conventionalities of peaceful life are brushed aside. When the knapsack serves as pillow and the cloak as the nightly cover, when you wade through the mud and mire and knee-high water of the trench, when soap and razor and comb are dispensed with, there departs with them all the civility which many generations have labored to breed in us. The elemental forces are unleashed. Man becomes the nature man of bygone sons and savagery and brutality and lust, unbridled, unchecked, manifest themselves. War does away with cherished institutions, with the much-vaunted democracy for once. Democratic governments are not made for warfare. The newborn democracy of Russia is weary of the war. Authority there must be in the soldier's camp, and authority is centered in the few, nay, in the one autocrat. Whether that autocrat takes shape in a visible personality or whether the state is invested with autocratic powers, it is all the same. The normal democracy of peace times distributes authority. It undertakes to meddle with the individual as little as possible. But once we become a camp, individual rights mean nothing. We have had much to say about certain European conceptions of the state as a sort of mystic being and all-powerful. We cannot but drift into the same channel. The state drafts, conscripts, taxes. The difference between us and Europe is that there, at least in certain parts, and no doubt for good reasons, nations have lived even in peace times in a state of expectant war. Who can say that we shall be spared the experience when the much-delayed peace shall at last have been effected? Who knows whether the peace will be permanent or but a truce? For the time being we have of necessity surrendered ourselves, our lives and all we have, the body and the spirit, into the keeping of the military organization. Let there be no false illusions about our future. It cannot be the same as our past. What was efficient enough for the days when we thought ourselves secure in our isolation will not do after we have gone in for world politics. We are swimming with the tide. Let us hope that the elements will be merciful. Out of the wreck some old landmarks may emerge unscathed, untouched. Certainly we shall be a bit coarsened. We hope that on the whole our moral fibre will withstand the elemental forces. But you cannot make an omelet without breaking eggs. So said the Iron Chancellor, and he was a past master in state culinary. Certain cherished theories will go to the smash. If we play with fire, we must be scorched. The loss of lives and wealth may be appalling. But far more disastrous is the loss of the proprieties, the collapse of that fabric of civilization so long in rearing. Even in common life necessity is a curse. It destroys the sweetness of civil manners. Where necessity reigns, command takes the place of request or wish or prayer. You simply have to do the thing. But having to do things robs the act of its nicety. It becomes elemental, rude, brutal. Civilization means the domination of the natural instincts, not being dominated by them. Let us then walk into the business of the hour with eyes open. There is no room for illusion.

OUR OWN LITTLE WORLD.

From the storm raging abroad, one would fain betake himself into the quiet and safety of his own home But, alas, frequently it happens that the havoc invades even that retreat. The great world about us is in the grip of a deadly conflict. Everywhere the great and the little nations, belligerent or neutral, seek to set their own house in order. The strife of peace times is banished. No matter how great the disparity between various elements in a nation or state, the common danger works as a great conciliator within. People meet each other half way. They come to an understanding. The common weal stands higher than partisan interests. But the house of Israel, it would seem, is differently constituted and differently disposed. As citizens we naturally fall in with the patriotic spirit which submerges all differences of opinion. But when it comes to the questions affecting the welfare of the Jewish people, or of a section thereof, we remain somehow at cross-purposes. There are among us those who are more zealous for their fractional interests than for the common welfare. To safeguard the authority and power of some organization which is but one among many seems to be the all-absorbing concern of certain leaders. They pride themselves upon the power vested in them. They use their influence to the utmost to make their view prevail. They are machine-men, and the machine is their fetish. To be sure, loyalty to [illegible] organization is laudable. But that loyalty which bids a man go with it under all circumstances is by no means a virtue. Others pretend to cater to the masses. By vote and referendum they believe they can best serve Israel's cause. Democracy is the right kind of government. We in this country are inured to it. But we likewise know how it can be misused. When Korah rises against Moses, the fault is not always with Moses. And probably Korah is not altogether wrong. Yet Korah risen to power is quite as autocratic. But even in smaller matters we have with us the chronic caviller. Nothing that anybody else does is right. His chief reason seems to lie in the fact that he has not been consulted. We cannot all expect to be chosen to representative positions. Some of us; nay, the majority of us, must stay out. But that is no reason why we must condemn the work conscientiously done by others. Fault-finding is an easy occupation. It is negative, destructive. The man on the inside does the constructive work. Very often he yields to his associates. You cannot go in with a company without expecting differences of opinion. There must be give and take. Majority rules. All human work must needs be imperfect. But that does not warrant the outsider to think that he could have made it perfect. As a rule, the critic reveals but his inordinate conceit.

The summer months are coming on, and with them many and diverse Jewish assemblies. Each and every one has its own sphere, and within that it alone is competent. We have among us men who believe themselves born to lead. Let them lead in the province allotted to them. They are not the only ones in the Jewish world. We have enough talent to make leadership distributive. We have enough interests to divide them among the many bodies. Centralization of power is dangerous. Democratic countries are touchy on that subject. We Jews are likewise opposed to centralization. Whether in matters affecting the entire Jewish population of a land or in affairs confined to a community, there is room for several organizations to exist side by side with each other. They need not be placed under one roof. It would bespeak a regrettable poverty of talent were we to concede that all of it resides in one brain. In the multitude of counselors is wisdom. The assemblies will meet. So long as they keep within their own spheres, no outsider need meddle with them. But it is a foregone conclusion that matters affecting the whole household of Israel will occupy the attention of delegates. Let us hope that the selfish voice be hushed. We mean the selfishness of leaders, and the selfishness of organizations. None of them should arrogate to itself all authority. They should all be willing to hear the other side. And we express the hope that the spirit of conciliation will also descend upon the Jewish press. Week in and week out certain bellicose periodicals dish up the same unsavory food of internal strife. Some are more sinned against, it may be true, but they sin nevertheless, flagrantly, brazenly. We witness constant denunciation of fellow-Jews. Some of it reaches the outside world. It is a sad spectacle that we present. The calumniator is only too ready to make capital of such revelations. We assure the outsider that most of the lucubrations in our press need not be taken seriously. Still it is high time that we set our own little world in order. From the start it has been the policy of this paper and the organization it represents to work for peace. We earnestly call upon all American Jews to compose their differences. Let there be a truce. We know by this time each other's mind. We must agree to disagree. The right, as always, lies in the middle. The extremists must converge to the center. And the center resides in a line of action which will offend neither [illegible]e, which will not force down the throat of the opponent opinions to which we must necessarily take exception. The middle course is everywhere the safest and the justest. Only a united Israel can accomplish anything substantial. We hope that our appeal for peace will be heeded. It must be heeded, for the cause of the Jewish people is paramount, rising superior to all platforms and preconceived opinions. We live in troublous times. We have enough to bear. Let us make the burden lighter by a united front in the ranks of the Jewish people. Our own little world must present the appearance of stability, that we may conquer all obstacles and win a just cause.

AN EXPLANATION.

In our last issue we published a letter from the American Jewish Committee over the signature of Louis Marshall, President. We also commented thereon editorially under the headline "A Highly Important and Illuminating Document." What we said might fairly be construed as not being very complimentary to the American Jewish Committee nor to Mr. Marshall in respect, at least, of the rather comprehensive claims indicated by the letter. We have regarded nearly all of the members of the Executive Board of the American Jewish Committee as conservative and the publication of its activities as legitimate, but the letter was so worded as by implication to claim credit for the Russian Revolution. That was too much of a strain on our nerves.

We are now informed on the best of authority, that the letter was not written by Mr. Marshall, but by an assistant secretary of the American Jewish Committee on his own initiative, and that the writer of the letter appended thereto the lithographed copy of Mr. Marshall's signature without his knowledge or authority.

We make this statement in justice to Mr. Marshall, and are pleased to do so because in the explanation we find reason for returning to our former high opinion of Mr. Marshall's sanity and judgment.

Djemal Pasha Explains Palestine Outrages.

Military Government of Palestine Says Population Was Removed to Save It from Bombardment from Sea and Air.

The outrages against the Jews in Palestine, organized by Djemal Pasha, the Turkish military governor, are explained by him, as was expected, as having been actuated by the humane motive of saving the Jews of Jaffa and the colonie from the impending perils of bombardment by the British fleet and aviators, and removing them to places of safety. This excuse, the tenor of which was predicted by the Zionists, was made by him in a statement to the Wolff Agency on May 30, which for some unexplained reason has not been cabled to America. In the same statement, which came into the possession of the Provisional Zionist Committee today, Djemal Pasha absolutely denies every charge of cruelty in carrying out the "evacuation" and asserts that he will ask the Spanish, Austrian and German consuls to inspect every place where these outrages are said to have occurred. He says that he will also ask the chief rabbi of Jerusalem to make an official report on the situation and also invite three representatives of the German Jews to personally convince themselves that nothing was destroyed in Jaffa, Tel-Aviv, the modern suburb of that city, or in any of the colonies.

From the same source that it has received the foregoing information, the Provisional Zionist Committee is informed that the German military authorities are working most energetically on behalf of the "evacuated" Jews and are endeavoring to obtain Djemal Pasha's permission for their return to their homes. The "evacuation" from which both the Jewish and Arab population suffered, worked extraordinary hardship owing to the lack of means of transportation and food. The Jews of the unaffected colonies organized relief measures in the best possible manner, abandoning the harvest for the purpose of bringing succor. One hundred and twenty carriages were rushed down from Gallilee to help the evicted population to places of refuge, and the owners and drivers gave their services free. The students of the Herzl High School were sheltered near the colony Sichron Jacob. The youth of the colonies are facing the situation courageously, despite the constantly increasing distress of the evacuated, for whose relief the Zionist Actions Committee has issued an appeal, for which American co-operation is asked.

KARAITES ARRANGE FOR CLOSER RELATIONSHIP WITH RABBINIC JEWS.

A conference of the Karaites, held in Eupatria, Crimea, decided to enter in much closer relationship with the rabbinic Jews of Russia. It was also decided to remove the present Hacham, M. Shapsal, who was in close touch with the reactionary government.

The Karaites enjoyed under the old regime many more privileges than the Jews. They had no connection with the Jews, apparently because they were afraid that their position might be jeopardized thereby. This fear is now dissipated after the Jews also enjoy equal rights with the rest of the population.

PROMIENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT.

Dr. E. N. Calisch, of Richmond, Va., a member of the Executive Committee of the Order, served on the committee of reception at the time the British Commission to the United States visited the city of Richmond. Dr. Calisch has also been appointed by the Governor a member of the Ministerial Committee of the Richmond Council of National Defense.

Rabbi Martin Zielonka, prominent B'nai B'rith worker of El Paso, Texas, has been elected President of the Board of Trustees of the newly established city college of that city.

To commemorate his twenty-fifth anniversary as Grand Master of the Order B'rith Abraham, a testimonial banquet and reception was tendered to Sam Dorf on Tuesday evening, May 29, 1917.

STRAUS TO GIVE AWAY HIS HOME

$350,000 Residence to Be Sold for Benefit of the War Sufferers.

"Sacrificing everything for war, even the roof over your head", declared Nathan Straus yesterday.

True to his word, he is offering his $350,000 city home for sale. All the money it brings will be turned over for war relief purposes. He said yesterday:

"I have given all the money I can afford to give. I have taxed my fortune to the limit. But so long as I have property to give, I shall sacrifice that, too, to help my fellow-sufferers.

"The wealthy citizens of America have not been giving in proportion to their wealth. They have not been willing to make giving a sacrifice. It is a great reflection on the patriotism of the nation".

Last year Mr. Straus sold his $35,000 yacht to relieve Jewish distress in Palestine.

The house at No. 27 West Seventy-second street is the only city home Mr. Straus possesses. He and his family have taken up their residence permanently in their suburban home at Mamaroneck.

Today the "For Sale" sign will be tacked to the beautiful English basement dwelling of brick and stone. In addition to the formal "For sale or to rent" legend, the sign will bear the following:

"Proceeds to go to war sufferers".

Exquisite furnishings will go with the house. Only the most personal mementoes will be removed in case of sale. The dwelling, built in 1895, contains many quaint features, as it was built to order. There is a large rotunda in the center of the basement which is lighted indirectly from above. Another feature is the winding stairway in the center of the building.—New York "American".

ANTI-DISCRIMINATION BILLS PASSED IN MAINE AND CONNECTICUT.

The legislature of the state of Maine, as well as the legislature of the state of Connecticut, have passed anti-discrimination bills prohibiting discrimination in hotels against any people, on account of religion, race or color. The passage of these bills was undertaken at the suggestion of the Anti-Defamation League. Our brothers in these two states deserve much credit for their efforts in the passage of these bills. They also had the moral support of some of the best non-Jewish citizens, who think discrimination against any class of people is un-American and not worthy of our democratic institutions. The brothers in the state of Maine who took special interest in the passage of this bill are President of Israel Lodge, Bro. Dr. Elias Caplan, Bro. Dr. Cyrus K. Briggs, Secretary of the Lodge, Hon. Jacob Berman, ex-District Attorney of Portland, and Bro. Jacob Rosenberg. The brothers in the state of Connecticut who gave much time to the passage of this bill were Bro. Joseph Ullman, of New Haven, Hon. Samuel Campner, now Mayor of New Haven, Bro. Isaac Moss, president of the Bridgeport Temple, Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, second vice-president of District No. 1, Bro. Jacob B. Klein, past president of District No. 1, Bro. Morris D. Saxe, District deputy of New Britain and Bro. Rabbi Ettelson of Hartford.

CIVIC EQUALITY FOR ROUMANIAN JEWS.

The very welcome news reaches us that H. M. the King of Roumania, in reply to a Jewish deputation, has stated, at least inferentially, that Jewish subjects are to be granted equal rights with the rest of the Roumanian citizens. This promise, which we hope in due time to see given legislative effect to, and to be found to apply to all Roumanian Jews, will in such case bring Roumania into line with the Allies in the matter of civic and religious non-differentiation. While it therefore adds fresh moral strength to the Allies' position, it is a matter of profoundest interest to Jews, for it presages the removal of the last of the legal oppressions to which our people have been subjected. With the Roumanian Jews emancipated, Jewish political disabilities the world over will cease at last. We can be thankful for the imminence of a manumission for which we have hoped for so long, and rejoice that we are permitted to see the day when the last fetter bids fair to fall from the limbs of the Jew.—London "Jewish Chronicle".

POPE OPPOSED TO JEWISH PALESTINE.

An Italian correspondent of the New York "Evening Post" is the authority for the report that at the recent conference of the Allies in Rome, the question of the future of Palestine, Mesopotamia and other parts of Asia Minor was touched upon and limitations were placed on each one of the Allies as to the extent to which it may go in its conquests there. It was also the general feeling that the holy places in Palestine should be regarded common ground of all nations and should stand under the supervision of an international committee.

The same correspondent says that the Pope is following with the greatest interest the development of the idea of founding a Jewish State in Palestine. The Pope, in common with many other prominent Catholic leaders, believes that Christianity is closely associated with Palestine and that Palestine must therefore be Christian and should not be given over the Jews.

AMBASSADOR GERARD PRAISES JEWS OF GERMANY.

At a meeting of the National Art Club, former United States ambassador to Germany, Gerard, complimented the Jews of that country as follows:

"If not for the Jews, Germany would never have been noticed in the world of literature, science and art.

"The Jews in Germany are the true standard bearers of culture, and if there is anything Germany could be proud of it is of the Jews.

"Germany boasts of her 'kultur', her learning, that she is pre-eminent in philosophy, literature and art. But that is not true. It is not they—but the Jews, the Jews. Take away the Jews from all branches of her culture, and Germany is destitute!

"Prisoners in Germany are well taken care of on account of German-Jewish surgeons who are skilled, noble and kind".

The National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, Denver, Colo.

The Leon N. Levi Memorial Hospital, Hot Springs, Ark.

Report of the Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2, I. O. B. B., Appointed by Authority of the 1916 Grand Lodge Convention Held in Cleveland, Ohio, for the Purpose of Investigating the Condition of the National Jewish Hospital's Responsibility Towards Indigent Tubercular Jews in Denver, Colorado

To the President and Brothers of District Grand Lodge No. 2, I. O. B. B.:

At the Grand Lodge Convention held in Cleveland, Ohio, in May, 1916, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to investigate the condition of the National Jewish Hospital's responsibility towards indigent tubercular Jews in Denver and hand the findings of such investigation to our representative on the Executive Committee of the Constitution Grand Lodge for such action as may be proper, and the findings reported to the next District Grand Lodge".

In June, 1916, at the first meeting of the General Committee held in Cincinnati, Ohio, our President, Brother Karl M. Vetsburg, read a communication from the worthy President of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, urging him to be present on Sunday, June 8, 1916, at the dedication of the William S. Friedman Building and the annual meeting of the Hospital, thereby represent our District. It was the sense of the General Committee that our President should accept the invitation, and that, while at Denver, he should act as one of the committee of three to follow out the instructions of our Grand Lodge as embodied in the resolution hereinabove referred to. Thereupon an appointment of the other two members of the committee was made, and the investigation was conducted on June 18, 19, 20 and 21, 1916, at Denver.

Your committee now begs leave to submit its report.

According to the strict interpretation of the resolution under which we were appointed, our work was limited solely to the condition of the National Jewish Hospital's responsibility towards indigent tubercular Jews in Denver. Your committee, however, feeling that the Grand Lodge wanted a complete report on the present condition of indigent tubercular Jews, no matter where the responsibility, if any, might fall, took the liberty of extending its work beyond the scope of the resolution and investigated the condition of the Jewish indigent tuberculars in Denver from all angles, making as complete a survey as was possible in a limited time.

The National Jewish Hospital.

Your committee cannot be too strong in its praise, appreciation and commendation of our National Jewish Hospital and its great service to suffering humanity. An excellent spirit permeates the hospital—a spirit of personal interest shown by the doctors and other officials in each patient, which is reciprocated by the patients in appreciation and gratitude for the faithful efforts of the doctors and nurses in their behalf. The splendid laboratory and equipment in the Grabfelder Building show that the last word in medical research is adopted. Not only are the doctors faithful and conscientious, but they are able specialists in the treatment of tuberculosis. The executive department is conducted in a thorough, business-like manner, the patients are well fed and housed and the entire system in vogue in the Hospital seems to be working successfully and harmoniously. While the number of patients who can be accommodated is limited, the Hospital, when there is room, is ready to take all cases, and when there is no available room the patients are cared for as vacancies occur.

It was the pleasure and privilege of your committee to be present and to participate in the sixteenth annual meeting of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives held on June 19. It was our pleasure to see Brother Grabfelder, who has so unstintingly given up his life for sixteen long years to the magnificent work to which the National Hospital is dedicated, preside over the deliberations. It was also with a deep feeling of sorrow that we listened to the letter of resignation of our beloved deceased Brother Martin A. Marks, one of the founders and staunchest supporters of the National Jewish Hospital. It was with the greatest regret that the resignation of this splendid worker, whose heart and soul were in the work of the Hospital, was accepted. His work for this institution will stand out forever as a [illegible] monument.

We desire to report that certain innuendoes [illegible] at the National Hospital because of the alleged failure of the publication of certain reports are absolutely unwarranted. Our investigation discloses the fact that quite to the contrary, the National Hospital has been making an honest endeavor to have the results of every honorable and fair investigation published at all times. Along this line Brother Grabfelder at the annual meeting spoke as follows: "We want every sensible, honest, fair-minded person to investigate this Hospital, that has thousands and thousands of dollars at stake and thousands and thousands of lives under its control".

Regarding the financial condition of the hospital we beg to report that in the last fiscal year (June 1, 1915, to May 30, 1916) the hospital collected from regular contributors approximately $107,772.53, plus $329.98 interest on treasurer's deposits; total, $108,102.51, and expended approvimately $108,784.51. There was also given to the endowment fund the sum of $20,000. This fund represents bequests, money given in the name of departed relatives and lump sum contributions to the endowment sinking fund. So that in truth the hospital is not collecting from its subscribers for its daily wants as much as it really needs.

Although your committee was not asked to investigate the hospital, it feels that inasmuch as part of our time was spent at the hospital with the officers, doctors, workers and patients, it is not beyond the scope of our authority unqualifiedly to commend its work in every way and to bespeak for it the continued moral and financial support of all Jews to a greater extent than that which it receives at present.

The Jewish Consumptives' Relief Society.

It was the pleasure of our committee also to visit the Jewish Consumptives' Relief Society, commonly known as J. C. R. S., and to interview Dr. Spivak, its secretary. The J. C. R. S. is also doing magnificent work toward checking the ravages of the white plague. This institution is another which is entitled to unqualified support, not only from the Order of B'nai B'rith, but from all the Jews of America.

Denver Charitable Organizations.

In order to ascertain the actual number of Jewish tubercular indigents, who are not confined in the hospitals, we sought and enlisted the co-operation of charitable organizations of Denver, including the Jewish Aid Society, the Ex-Patients' Society and the Bureau of Charity and Correction.

The Jewish Aid Society, of which Mrs. David is superintendent, was established in December of 1915 and at the time of our investigation did not have sufficient funds to give adequate relief to all indigent Jewish tuberculars.

The Ex-Patients' Society has been established for some years, but is hampered in its work by lack of funds.

The Bureau of Charity and Correction is non-sectarian, being a department of social welfare maintained by the city and county of Denver; Miss Gertrude Vaile is the executive secretary.

There formerly existed a Federation of Jewish Charities and a Jewish Social Service Bureau, both of which at the time of our investigation were either out of existence or dormant.

From the organization first named and other sources we received the names of dependent tubercular Jews and your committee then made personal tours of inspection to the houses of these unfortunates in order to see for ourselves whether or not adequate relief was being given them.

Typical Cases.

We visited practically one hundred homes and made a complete record of each visit to ascertain the previous residence, number in family, average weekly income, time spent in either of the Denver hospitals, amount of outside assistance and the source of assistance. We cite below the history of some of the cases which vividly portray the real conditions as they exist today in Denver.

Family A.—Consists of husband, wife and three children. Formerly lived in New York. The husband has been twice at the National Hospital and was at the time of our visit in the J. C. R. S. The wife is weak-lunged and predisposed to tuberculosis. The three children are infected. One of these sleeps with the mother. This family lives in the same house with another tuberculous person.

Family B.—Consists of mother and three children, one boy and two girls. Father deserted them. Mother and the boy have been in both hospitals at various times. The family receives aid from the city and Ex-Patients' Society. Mother complains that when the federation was in existence it was better for them. At present she does not know to whom to go for relief.

Family C.—Consists of mother, who is tubercular, father and ten children. The husband is unable to work. Help is being given them by the city. In this home ten children and the mother occupy two beds in one room.

Family D.—Consists of mother and son aged thirty. The mother is unable to work and the son is tubercular and was at the J. C. R. S. for eight months in 1913 and twelve months in 1915. He is unable to work. The city and Jewish Aid Society are helping them at times.

Family E.—Consists of wife and two small children. The husband came to Denver in 1906 and died of tuberculosis in 1910. One of the boys sells papers and earns about twenty cents a day. The other is too young. The city charities are helping them.

Family F.—Consists of wife and four children. Only one is able to work. He sells papers and earns about $2.40 a week. The family has been in Denver since 1908. The father was at the hospital three different times and once for one year. The wife was there for eleven months. The family received aid from the city as follows: March, 1916, $18.60; April, 1916, $7.60; May, 1916, $8.10.

Family G.—Consists of a father, mother and two children. The parents are both tubercular and syphilitic. The children are eight and twelve years old respectively. The Jewish Aid Society has been paying $5.00 per week and furnishing coal and rent.

Family H.—Consists of husband, wife and four children. Came from New York. The father is dying. Has been in the J. C. R. S. hospital for eight and one-half months. The mother takes in sewing and averages $2.50 per week. One child is now deaf. The Jewish Aid Society pays the family $5.00 per week, furnishes coal and pays the rent.

Family I.—Consists of father, mother and four children, the oldest nine and the youngest two. One of the children already has a tubercular knee. The father was in the National Hospital six years ago for six months and can only work periodically. They live in two rooms and all sleep in one room except the father, who sleeps in the kitchen. This case originated from Newark, N. J. The city charities gave the following relief: January, 1916, $2.30; February, 1916, $3.00; March, 1916, $3.00; April, 1916, $13.00; May, 1916, $28.45. Prior to this time they were helped by the Federation of Jewish Charities, which is now out of existence.

Family J.—Consists of father, mother and three children, the oldest fourteen and the youngest seven. The latter has tubercular glands in his throat. The father was at the National Hospital for eight months, and the J. C. R. S. twice for five months at a time. He can work but little, earning on an average of $5.00 per week for three months in the year. They receive from the city $3.00 per week and the rent.

The Denver Sheltering Home for Jewish Children.

Is there a place at present for the children of these Jewish sufferers? In 1909 an organization was effected to care for some of these little ones whose parents are in the hospital or are waiting their turn to get in. A home was secured and at present there are thirty children cared for. Ninety per cent of these children are of indigent tuberculars. To be exact, out of thirty, twenty-seven are the children of tuberculars. A new building is about completed which will care for forty children. The new home is ideally situated. The good done by this organization is of inestimable value. The cost of maintenance will be $7,500 per annum and we are advised that since there are but 974 contributing members averaging $4.75 per annum, it is questionable if sufficient funds will be obtainable to enable the officers to continue the work. There is always a waiting list of about fifty children. It will be almost a calamity if this great work must cease because of lack of funds.

The Denver Situation.

The Denver situation is a peculiar one because of conditions beyond Denver's control. The city is climatically so situated that those who suffer from tuberculosis make Denver their objective point regardless of their financial condition, and as a rule the entire family goes, if not at the time the afflicted parent goes, within a comparatively short time thereafter.

Generally, charitable organizations, or an organized group of charitably inclined men, make it possible for the afflicted one and his family to make the trip. They come practically penniless, with no friends in Denver, and according to the rule of the National Conferences of Charities, if they remain one year, they become residents of Denver. Here is where a great injustice is done the Denver community. A family, one or more members of which are admittedly broken in health, is made a charge on Denver one year after its arrival, and in many cases the sending community does nothing at all for the family except to furnish the initial transportation. The wage earner is, in the majority of these cases, without earning capacity when he lands, and as the disease progresses he becomes still less able to work. Should he get better he works a while, but again come the ravages of the terrible disease, sapping his vitality, and once again he must go to the sanitarium. In short, according to the rule now in vogue, such a migrator loses his legal residence in his home place, and it is established in a climatic resort away rom his relatives and all the natural helpers, while he is unable to attain real power of independence. This is eminently unfair.

Here is a concrete example: A man came from the Atlantic seaboard to the National Jewish Hospital. He was there for a year and a half except for a short time out of the hospital (about the middle of the time), dependent on charity the entire time he was in the sanitarium. Upon his discharge he was returned to his home city, where his wife and family had been all the time. Six weeks later he decided the climate in Colorado, where he had improved in health, was better for him, and the public authorities sent him and his family to Denver. When Denver protested they replied, "The man had lived a year and a half in Denver and had been back here only six weeks".

Can Denver to these people say, "Go home and die"? Our investigation shows that even when cured the tubercular, fearful of a recurrence of the disease, will not go back to his former surroundings. Here lies the real tragedy. They will not be convinced that they will be happier and better at home.

Dr. M. Collins, superintendent of the National Jewish Hospital, said to us: "Fifty per cent of the patients either remain or come back after leaving". Is this, then, a problem that Denver must solve? Is it a Colorado problem or a national problem? Can these poor Jews be called residents of Denver in the sense that it is Denver's obligation to care for them? We learn from Miss Gertrude Vaile, executive secretary of the Denver Bureau of Municipal Charities, that of 324 cases (Jewish and non-Jewish) handled in 1915, 319 were born outside of Colorado and in the other five cases the place of birth was not recorded.

In a paper read before the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis in May, 1916, Miss Vaile said in part:

"We have in Denver two national Jewish tuberculosis sanitariums, the National Jewish Hospital and the Jewish Consumptive Relief Society Sanitarium, both supported by Jewish contributions from the entire country, both open to destitute Jews from the entire country. What is the result of this situation in Denver? The Jewish Social Service Federation, which deals with needy families in their homes, finds that about ninety per cent of all their home relief work is in cases of tuberculosis. Our entire ghetto is a tuberculosis colony".

"Why so much more migration of destitute tuberculous Jews than of any other tuberculous people? Personally I can find but one possible answer—the existence in Denver of the two national hospitals. This answer and the efforts of the Jewish Social Service Federation to place back the responsibility for each case, case by case, according to the rules of the National Jewish Conference, upon the community from which the people came, have resulted in such exceedingly strained relations between the hospitals and the local Jewish charities that finally all sides have united to call for a survey of the situation. Whatever solution of the difficulty the Jewish people may choose to try out, they are a united, self-conscious, social-conscious group. They may make their own rules, and they can apportion the responsibility equitably among themselves".

Your committee finds that notwithstanding the fact that Denver climatic conditions attract tuberculars, nevertheless, since the two Jewish hospitals have been established the indigent tuberculars who establish their homes in Denver have increased in number. The reason is obvious. They come, find employment, are poor in health, and remain, eking out as good an existence as possible, working when able, frequently suffering relapses and then going from one hospital to the other in search of relief.

Another phase of the situation is tha of the fear and dislike tuberculars meet in their every-day life. It is difficult for them to find a boarding house, no matter how much pay is offered. It is also a difficult matter for them to find work they can do, and when they can do so, they are feared by their associates, and often they are refused lucrative positions because of their poor health. From an open letter recently sent out by the Commission of Charity and Correction of Denver, the following is taken:

"The greatest problem of Denver charity is the care of the people who come to Denver for tuberculosis. They come sometimes dependent from the moment of arrival, sometimes supported for a while by relatives and friends in the East who can not continue such help indefinitely, sometimes with a little savings or strength enough to work for a few months, perhaps even for a year or more before the breakdown becomes complete, but with dependency imminent from the day they arrive. Denver is wholly incapable of giving adequate care to this host of destitute, suffering strangers from other places. The officials of Denver feel, moreover, that it is not just that they should be required to care for those who come here only as a health resort with their power of earning already broken and all their natural ties elsewhere.

"In view of these facts the public relief authorities and the charitable organizations of Denver hold that when people come to Denver for health reasons, if they become dependent from the original complaint within three years after their arrival, they ought to remain indefinitely a charge upon the community in which they had residence immediately prior to coming to Denver".

The Denver Jewish community had endeavored and now is endeavoring to do what it can to relieve the present conditions. Unfortunately there are several organizations, none blessed with sufficient funds, none working in union with another, and none with a definite plan of service, but all attempting in a measure to solve the problem. Although the Federation of Jewish Charities organized several years ago is out of existence, at the time of the investigation there was an attempt being made to organize another federation so that united work can be done. The Central Jewish Aid Society was organized on Oct. 25, 1916, and expects to raise from $10,000 to $20,000 annually. Besides, each of the hospitals has agreed to contribute to the reorganized federation $5,000 per year.

Is Adequate Relief Given?

To the question of whether or not at the present time dependent Jewish tuberculars and their families are adequately assisted, your committee unqualifiedly answers in the negative. The National Hospital and the J. C. R. S. do but very little in the way of after care of patients, nor can such after care reasonably be provided by them, unless additional funds for that purpose be subscribed by the sending communities, for the latter must ultimately assume that responsibility.

Dr. Spivak said: "The after care of patients is a national problem and the Denver Jewish community can not solve it. When a patient leaves the hospital he is weak and cannot begin at once to earn a livelihood". Mrs. David, superintendent of the Jewish Aid Society, said: "We do all we can with our limited capital. At present we are not giving adequate relief. We need a visiting nurse, a visiting housekeeper and a dispensary"

Your committee does not consider that the doling out of a few dollars here and there is adequate relief. Tuberculars must be dealt with on a different basis than that on which the ordinary social worker deals with a case. In the first place, the living conditions must be carefully watched; second, the proper kind of light employment must be found; third, the place of employment must be conducive to good health; fourth, medicines must be dispensed liberally and judiciously; fifth, the wife must be taught the proper kind of food to cook; and last, but most important of all, the children must be carefully watched. Children of tuberculars become infected sleeping in the same room with tubercular parents, brothers or sisters. In some instances, children should be taken from afflicted parents and placed in different environments, even if the machinery of the juvenile court must be invoked; otherwise, a generation of consumptives is likely to follow.

Even though the giving of money does not solve the problem, the fact does remain that the Jewish organizations in Denver are not distributing sufficient funds to these unfortunates to supply their wants. For example, the allowance made to an adult is $1.25 to $1.50 per week. A healthy family cannot get along on this basis, and surely a family in which there is constant sickness, necessitating medicines, nourishing food, and many other necessities, cannot exist on such a basis.

In 1915, besides the Jewish tubercular families helped by Jewish contributions, the Denver City Charities assisted 65 families, representing 291 people, and expended in relief $1,483.54. To these must be added 34 cases receiving service only, making a total of 99 Jewish families whom the city of Denver assisted in 1915 up to June, 1916. The entire sum expended can be divided into four heads—groceries, coal, cash allowance and rent. We are advised by Miss Vaile that heavier relief is now being given to Jewish cases than ever before.

We beg to submit excerpts from a letter written to our committee by Miss Gertrude Vaile, executive secretary of the Denver Bureau of Charity and Correction, under date of June 23, 1916:

"In order that your understanding may be as clear as possible regarding the relation of the City Charities office to the Denver Jewish relief problem, I should like to put in writing the following explanation:

"While there was a Jewish federation here, that office aimed to handle all Jewish cases, and to give relief from Jewish funds in all cases so far as possible. They did not, however, have funds sufficient for adequate relief, and as Jewish citizens are certainly as much entitled to relief from the city as any others we supplemented the efforts of the Jewish federation on their requests. Every Jewish case upon application at this office was simply referred to the federation and in effect we constituted the federation our investigation agency for those cases and gave relief only upon their recommendation.

"After the federation disbanded and there were two Jewish relief societies, this method could not be satisfactorily pursued. We found that we were being asked by one office to do one thing when the other office was expecting us to do something different. Under these circumstances it seemed to me very much the best thing for each office to handle its own work entirely separately. It was, therefore, understood that this office would give no more supplementary relief, but if either society desired to refer a case to this office we should take it up independently and carry out the treatment entirely. In this way it was thought we should give larger relief to a few cases instead of a little relief to many, the total amount being presumably about as it had been.

"Since the first of March this office has dealt with Jewish cases only as referred by one of the two Jewish societies, and at that point the Jewish society originally concerned dropped the matter. If a case was referred to us by one society we did not thereafter refer it to the other, but all new cases which came to us without being referred by one of the societies, we referred to the Jewish Aid Society.

"You asked me how much I thought would be needed for home relief for Jewish people in Denver. I have thought that matter over very carefully since you asked me, and have done quite a little figuring. I do not think it can be done adequately under $40,000 a year, and to that should be added the institutional care in the sheltering home and anything additional which is done in the way of establishing further medical service such as a West Colfax dispensary and visiting nurse, etc. To make an estimate would be proportionate to what the little Dutch community is doing here for its proportionately smaller number of cases, it would take about $60,000.

"And I hope you do agree with me that these tubercular people here, even though they have been here a considerable number of years, are not really properly Denver charges, since they came on account of the tuberculosis and with their earning power already broken".

So it can be readily seen that with the city charities handling some cases, the Jewish organizations others, coupled with the difference of opinion among the organizations as to how some cases are to be handled, the real sufferer is the recipient, who knows not where to go or what to do, and moreover, it is quite beyond the bounds of reason to expect the Denver community with its 10,000 Jews to assume an annual burden of $40,000. We learn that this year the Denver Board of Charities passed a resolution that the work of the city charities could be facilitated by the organization of one effective society in Denver.

Local Sanatoria.

There seems to be a consensus of opinion among social workers that the day of the national institutions are numbered, and that this situation has, in a large measure, been brought about by the establishment of local sanatoria in the vicinity of our larger cities. It cannot be within the province of this committee to express any opinion as to whether or not local sanatoria can be as effective in the treatment of tubercular patients as sanatoria in Denver, for the question is essentially a medical one, for medical experts to decide. And even among these medical experts there is a radical divergence of opinion. Your committee is satisfied, after having interviewed tuberculosis experts in Denver, in Cleveland, in Dayton, and in St. Louis, that the time will never come when there will no longer be a need for the maintenance of hospitals in Denver. There can be no doubt whatsoever that the salubrious Denver climate does much to retard the ravages of the white plague and has in countless hundreds of cases effected a permanent cure.

The Jews of America should feel such a pride in the conduct of the National Jewish Hospital and of the Jewish Consumptive Relief Society that they ought to be willing to do for the indigent sick of their own race what they would be willing to do for a member of their own family should he suffer a similar misfortune.

Conclusion.

From the above information your committee concludes: That adequate relief is not being given tubercular Jews in Denver; that the problem is not a local problem for Denver alone to solve, but it is a national responsibility to be assumed and discharged by the co-operative efforts of all Jews in the United States.

Recommendations.

We respectfully submit the following recommendations:

1. That the National Jewish Hospital and the Jewish Consumptives Relief Society of Denver, Colo., be liberally supported by all Jews, both morally and financially, to a greater extent than at the present time, so that proper after-cure can be given to ex-patients.

2. That the National Jewish Hospital and the Jewish Consumptives Relief Society each make an annual contribution to an organized effective body which shall comprise all of the Jewish social service agencies in the city of Denver.

3. A competent, effective and efficient organization of all of the Denver Jewish social service agencies with uniformity of method which shall receive the moral as well as financial support of the entire Denver Jewish community.

4. That the National Conference of Jewish Charities so amend its rules as to provide that where the cause of physical distress or mental weakness exists at the time the applicant arrives in another city, the sending community shall remain liable for the support of such applicant.

5. That the Denver Sheltering Home for Jewish Children be enlarged and that the executive committee of the Constitution Grand Lodge contribute annually to it, as well as to whatever organization is formed as contemplated in the third recommendation hereinabove.

6. That close co-operation and complete harmony between the National Hospital and the J. C. R. S. is an essential prerequisite to the obtaining of the best results.

7. In the event that the National Hospital and the J. C. R. S. determine upon the suggested contributions, the local or sending communities shall not be relieved of their respective burdens so far as after-care of their individual cases is concerned.

8. That, if necessary, the aid of the juvenile court be invoked to compel the segregation of healthy children from tubercular parents, brothers, sisters or others who live in the same house with them, and who are so afflicted.

9. That an employment bureau be established in Denver for the purpose of obtaining proper employment for Jewish consumptives.

10. That out of the proposed funds to be given to the proposed central organization, said organization provide necessary visiting nurses, visiting housekeepers, and free dispensaries, adequately to care for the needs of the poor tuberculars.

11. That patients be discouraged from coming to Denver except through the channels of the local charitable organization, which must assume full responsibility according to the rules of the National Jewish Hospital and the Jewish Consumptive Relief Society.

Respectfully submitted,
SIDNEY G. KUSWORM,
KARL M. VETSBURG,
ALFRED A. BENESCH.

B'NAI B'RITH OF GERMANY

Report of the Grand President of District No. 8, Submitted to the General Committee, December 9, 1916

The vicious war still continues to rage and for this reason only a meeting of the General Committee took place in the autumn of 1916, instead of a Grand Lodge session, the fifth meeting the General Committee during the war.

In my report I confine myself to the events which have transpired since the last session of the General Committee on June 4, 1916.

In the first place we remember the brethren who have worked with us in our great Order and have now departed from us.

The following brethren who were ex-presidents of lodges died: Herman of Dortmund, Freyer of Stettin, Ignatz Cohn of Berlin, for many years Chairman of the Court of Appeals of the Grand Lodge; Joseph Bach of Halberstadt, Lahnstein of Wiesbaden, Adolf Schueck of Ratibor, Gottschalk of Cologne, Siegfried Cohn of Goerlitz, Doernberger of Dortmund, Wolf of Heilbron, Wienskowitz of Zabrze, Graetz of Wolfenbuettel, and Josef Eschelbacher of Berlin. Nearly all of them were men whose importance never exhausted itself in our lodge organization, who as representatives of their respective communities have rendered conspicuous service to the fatherland and showed themselves as true sons of our Order. At the time of their departure unusual honors were bestowed upon them. Within us remains the love for them and for us endures the work which they have created.

With special sadness do we remember the brethren and their sons who recently fell upon the field of honor. The following brethren died heroic deaths: Karl Hochschield of Lothringen Lodge, Metz; Leo Bachman of Jacob Plant Lodge, Nordhausen; Jacob Buscher of Bergische Lodge, Elberfeld; Julius Biram of Hardenberg Lodge, Frankford on the Oder; Dr. Julius Rath of Niederheim Lodge, Crefeld; Sally Abraham of Deutsche Reichs Lodge, Berlin; Alfred Israel of Zion Lodge, Hannover; Carl Lewandowski of Steinthal Lodge, Hamburg.

We have also to record some tragic [illegible] which have recently again hap[illegible] families of our brethren thro[illegible] upon the field of honor. With Bro. [illegible] Huth of Germania Lodge in Halle we lament that now he is bereaved of two sons. With deep sympathy we remember the same fate suffered by the widow of our Bro. Philipp Schwab, as well as of the widow of Bro. ex-President Mayer Ganz, who have also left two sons on the field of honor.

In the face of these calamities our satisfaction is greater when we learn of the recognition and distinction which those who belonged to us have experienced.

Bro. First Lieutenant Advocate Manneberg of Freiheit Lodge in Oppeln has received the first-class iron cross, likewise Bro. Chief Staff Physician Dr. Adam of Steinthal Lodge in Hamburg, and Bro. Staff Physician Dr. Hirschfelder of Niederheim Lodge in Crefeld. They are joined by the sons of our brethren, Alphons Lyon of Saar Lodge in Saarbruecken, Lieutenant of the reserve Hugo Lyon, Lieutenant Hugo Beer, son of the deceased Bro. Michael Beer, also of Saar Lodge, and Lieutenant Franz Hessdoerfer, son of our Bro. Counsellor Dr. Hessdoerfer of the Rhenus Lodge in Mainz, a son of Bro. Sigismund Gottlob of Berthold Auerbach Lodge in Berlin, and Lieutenant Bernhard Stern, son of Bro. Ludwig Stern of Stuttgart Lodge in Stuttgart.

Altogether five brethren and four sons of brethren have received the first-class iron cross.

An additional number of brethren and sons of our brethren have received the second-class iron cross and several brothers and nurses have received other distinctions for work performed during the war time—they all have done their duty and we rejoice with them in the recognition which was paid to them.

From 77 lodges 1,463 brethren are in the field. Of these 80 were wounded or became sick and 41 fell.

From 77 lodges 207 sons of brethren are in the field. Of these 265 are wounded or sick and 130 fell.

From 68 lodges 325 sons-in-law are in the field. Of these 23 are wounded or sick and 19 fell.

The second-class iron cross was bestowed upon 186 brethren, 275 sons, 40 sons-in-law of brethren.

On festival occasions I emphasize the [illegible] [illegible]chel, the first Grand President [illegible] No. 8, celebrated his eightieth [illegible]ersary in freshness of body

The brethren, Louis Kreslawsky of Berlin and Isidor Goldschmidt of Dortmund celebrated their seventieth birthdays, and the brethren, Ollendorf of Barmen and Dr. Leopold Cohn of Hildesheim, celebrated their silver weddings.

In these moment we renew our good wishes to all these brethren.

Upon his own request Bro. Goldschmidt has been transferred from the 4th into the 5th army corps. By this act he is in a position to attend to Grand Lodge work oftener than before. Bro. Hollaender also devotes himself to the Grand Lodge office as often as his activity in the hospital train brings him to Berlin.

Every new phase of the war is felt very much at the Grand Lodge office, for many coreligionists who belong to hostile countries and are living here come to us with requests for advice and help. In spite of the abundance of work, the office under the management of Bro. Finkel did justice to all tasks.

It seems that the appeal which I as Grand President addressed to the brethren to remember the Grand Lodge with some more benefactions was not without effect.

We were able to register the following new foundations:

A Sally and Helene Heyman foundation with the amount of 100,000 mark, of which 60,000 mark are for the nurses' cause and 40,000 for a vacation home.

A Siegfried Bruenn foundation with the sum of 100,000 mark, in the interest of the Jewish youth.

A Narbert Levy foundation with the amount of 10,000 mark, for those injured by the war.

A Maximilian Stein foundation with the sum of 5,000 mark, for the benefit of the Jewish youth.

Donations were received from Bro. Dr. Emil Hirsch of Halberstadt, 1,000 mark for the hospital train.

From Bro. Ferdinand Liebhold of Heidelberg, in conjunction with his son-in-law, 400 mark, for those injured in the war.

From the Gratitude to Invalids Society, through Bro. Engel of the Deutsche Reichs Lodge, 600 mark.

From Germania Lodge of Halle, 1,000 mark, as part of a foundation for which it has itself received the sum of 8,000 mark.

From Bro. Ollendorf, 250 mark, as part of a foundation which he himself has received from his lodge on the occasion of his silver wedding.

The heartiest thanks of the Grand Lodge are expressed to the donors and founders.

Besides the donations mentioned above the lodges have announced other sums which the brethren have turned over to them.

A compilation of these foundations in the lodges must be reserved for a later time. Today we will only emphasize the fact that a Christian lady has placed at the disposal of Bro. Moritz Joseph, ex-president of the Berend Lehman Lodge, the sum of 10,000 mark for a foundation for Jewish benevolent aims. Bro. Joseph has turned over this amount to the management of the lodge with the stipulation that the interest shall be used for the equipment of a Jewish vacation colony in Halberstadt.

In a time in which a current of antagonism to the Jews is beginning to be revived, such an act of an unprejudiced Christian works beneficially and reassuringly.

Besides the mentioned donations the lodges, according to the resolution of the General Committee, have contributed 73,000 mark to the war welfare fund of the Grand Lodge.

A special compilation shows the pro rata amounts with which the individual lodges have participated in the war welfare fund. Two of the Berlin lodges have up till now not been in the position to close up their collections. Several of the lodges have sent in partial contributions and held out the prospect of more contributions, so that the sum total will probably be about 80,000 mark.

As the war welfare fund is for the benefit of the entire district, we express the hope that no lodge that is able to contribute will keep itself aloof from the collection.

On the whole, the financial condition of the Grand Lodge may be considered as favorable.

It is self-understood that an exact summary can only be given after the close of the year. This will be possible to be done at the next meeting of the General Committee.

For the present it can be stated that the property of the Grand Lodge amounted:

At the end of Dec., 1915......570,185.83M
On Sept., 30, 1916............631,558.47M

No great changes in the inner life of the lodges during the war are to be recorded. Feasts are not celebrated. Only two lodges have consecrated new rooms during the time covered by this report: Leopold Zunz Lodge in Braunschweig and Fraternitas Lodge in Dresden.

In the last named lodge Bro. Kuznitzky represented the Grand Lodge.

I myself visited Hardenberg Lodge in Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Solomon Munk Lodge in Glogau.

The Brethren Goldschmidt and Kirchstein were present at the convention of the Union of Lodges in Posen on Dec. 3.

The members of the General Committee deserve thanks for having undertaken to visit the following lodges: Bro. Leibhold, Breisgau Lodge in Freiberg, Carl Friedrich Lodge in Karlsruhe, Zaehringer Lodge in Pforzheim and August Lamey Lodge in Mannheim. Bro. Kuznitzky, Fraternitas Lodge in Dresden. Bro. Apfel of Cologne, Maerkische Lodge in Dortmund. Bro. Goldschmidt of Berlin, Leopold Zunz Lodge in Braunschweig. Bro. Maretzki accepts the invitation of the Jacob Plaut Lodge in Nordhausen and will visit the same.

The inquiry about the number of the lodge meetings and the attendance which I had arranged for my report for the previous meeting of the General Committee has the effect that all the lodges have again resumed their regular meetings, also the Hamburg Lodge, which in consequence of having given up its rooms for hospital purposes, rarely held meetings during the last two years. The results of the lectures, as reported to us; show that the respective organs—Officers' Council and Intellectual Committee—continue their endeavors to make the meetings interesting.

Of course, it must not be forgotten that in consequence of the call to military service the lodges really have to struggle with great difficulties. We constantly receive reports that presidents and vice-presidents of lodges had been summoned by the military authorities. The smaller lodges also complain that on account of the military duty of many brethren the meetings cannot be well attended.

In order to retain a livelier interest in the lodge work among the brethren the visits to the lodges by the brethren of the General Committee will have to be augmented. Special propositions for increasing the lodge attendance are embodied in the report of Bro. Dr. Goldschmidt and Bro. Dr. Apfel, his assistant. The Berend Lodge has also made a motion in this regard.

With the resumption of the regular meetings in the lodges the propaganda also goes hand in hand. It is true mass initiations cannot take place under the present conditions as they did in time of peace, but every lodge, if it only works with energy and perseverance, is in a position to win new members for the Order.

Since the last session of the General Committee until now various lodges have initiated 38 brethren. Besides these five candidates from the city of Crossen have applied for admission in Hardenburg Lodge.

To be sure, we must expect a reduction of the membership. Even now we have had 160 deaths since January, eight of whom have died heroic deaths and 70 members have withdrawn from the Order.

The Lessing Lodge has also given zealous attention to the question of propaganda and has called a project into life which can be designated as a sort of Schreber gardens for brethren where vegetable raising is carried on in a general useful way.

Our Hospital Train has continued its activity in an unchanged manner as a blessing of the sick and wounded. Altogether, it has made 36 trips and has forwarded at least 8,000 wounded and sick to their homes. At present it is assigned to the southern German army and unfolds its activity on the Galicia-Russian front. As the Hospital Train has been active nearly on the entire east front, we suggested its transfer to the west for the particular purpose of making it possible that it shall come in closer touch also with the lodges of the west and southwest part of Germany. Everywhere the train has been heretofore, in Koenigsberg, Danzig, Hamburg, Bremen, Luebeck, Magdeburg, Berlin, Goerlitz, Breslau, Posen, Bromberg, Hannover, Nuernberg, Leipzig, Insterburg and Stettin, it has been received by the brethren in the very heartiest manner, so that the brethren who are working on the train were satisfied in the highest measure with the friendly sentiment manifested towards them. The Hospital Train came often to Allenstein and Lissa, in Prussia, but could not stay there for any length of time. I take occasion here, too, to express my heartiest thanks to the lodges for their affectionate receptions.

At the head of the Hospital Train now stands as chief physician Dr. Jakubowski member of Amicitia Lodge in Posen. As accompanying physician is active Bro. Dr. Gilde of Muenchen Lodge, while the management and the representation of the Grand Lodge on the train is as formerly in the hands of Bro. Dr. Hollaender. Bro. Dr. Hollaender has taken occasion to report, by request, in the lodges where the train had visited, about the train, his activities and about general questions of interest.

Through the rich gifts which individual lodges have formerly donated for the Hospital Train it is possible even today to afford pleasure to the brethren on the train, especially to the sick and wounded with friendly gifts. The means which we still have at our disposal make it possible for us to provide if necessary more friendly gifts.

The relation with the Red Cross has developed in an entirely satisfactory manner.

The amount collected by the lodges in 1914 and 1915 will suffice for the maintenance of the Hospital Train for about a half a year longer. In order to remove a misunderstanding which formerly prevailed, it is necessary to call attention to the fact that not a single appropriation for the Hospital Train has up to date been made from the funds of the Grand Lodge, but all the current expenses are defrayed from the money collected by the lodges. No assessment on account of the Hospital Train has been levied till now.

Experience has taught that the Hospital Train is looked upon as a special manifestation of the Jewish sense of benevolence continued in the field and that it had undoubtedly acted in this direction entirely in the sense of the lodges which are its founders. Just a short time ago Parliament Deputy Gotheim mentioned the Hospital Train with praise in the general meeting of the Defense Society when he depicted the work which the Jews have contributed in the war.

The Union of Employment Bureaus which was forced to adjust its activity to the war conditions is now occupying itself, in conjunction with the main office of the trade council, especially with the care of and work creating for returning war cripples.

In spite of the war the cura[illegible] Manheimer foundation had thought it proper to announce a prize contest also this year. Although many young men of letters are now in the field and cannot think of intellectual occupations, 47 treatises were entered anyhow, some even came from the field.

Now and then propositions come to the Grand Lodge from the outside which we cannot accept in their full extent because they do not come within the scope of the Grand Lodge duties, but we follow them up with lively interest and support them as much as possible. So there was called into life in Switzerland a society, "Pro Causa Judaica," whose program aspires to gain equal rights for the Jews in all countries of their oppression and to the colonization of immigrants in Palestine. In consideration of the political character of this society we were forced to confine ourselves to a recommendation to our brethren but could not join the society as members.

For the same reason we could only participate as givers of information in the deliberations of the so-called "Red Mogen David," which aims to obtain better treatment for Jewish war prisoners.

The preservation of the Jewish middle class in Galicia, a problem of the Grand Lodge for Austria, also cut into our work. The same thing happened with the distribution of the money sent from America for Jewish war refugees.

The many requests from congregations and organizations of Russian Poland which were addressed to us have always been disposed of by us after inquiry of the Relief Fund, i. e., investigation in the very locality in question through our confidential men.

Our endeavors in regard to founding new lodges in Russian Poland have now again been resumed, after the proclamation of the Polish Kingdom.

The order of the day for the present session of the General Committee is not excessively extended, but there are still a few important propositions in it. These propositions refer to the care for our brethren (proposition by Peiser of Lessing Lodge), care for our organizations (proposition for an appropriation of a war credit of 20,000 mark for the nurses who are in the field), care in general (chances for work for the eastern Jewish workmen).

The condition of the eastern Jews still has a reactionary influence over our own circumstances, so significant that we must occupy ourselves intensely with amelioration of their state.

In the order of the day there is also a question which I would not like to pass over in this place: the war statistics of those belonging to different faiths, as it was attempted by political parties in the management committee of the Imperial Diet and put into practice by the Secretary of War in ordering the counting of the Jewish soldiers.

Such a deep-rooted uneasiness, yes, revolt, has seldom passed through the Jews in general as it did in the present time. This is expressed in many communications to the Grand Lodge. We are grateful to our Brother Dr. Haas that he has shown in such an excellent manner the frame of mind of the German Jews in regarding this mortifying decree of the Secretary of War. We have placed his excellent arguments at the head of our Monthly Reports for November. The Jewish organizations have immediately given their earnest attention to the question of the hour and certainly with success, as it is proven by the thanks deserving article of Brother Dr. Nathan which has reached the brethren just in the right time. This will also be manifested by the report of Brother Dr. Horwitz, the chairman of the Union of German Jews and of the Central Association of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith, who has declared himself ready to report personally in the German Committee meetings about this point.

We ourselves will not permit ourselves to be prevented from continuing to work for the interest of the fatherland as we understand it. The baseness of our adversaries is not lessened, our self-consciousness, however, and the confidence in our own power have risen. We have reason to rely courageously upon our organizations. In spite of all attacks the share which we have obtained in the fatherland by fighting for it will make the influence of the work which we have contributed in the hard war-times, proof against being totally eradicated, also in later years and we therefore dare count upon an advance.

As Germany stands against a world of enemies, so we, too, must progress by fighting step by step. As for Germany, so it must be for us to hold on and to hold out!

In such sense we shall progress by fighting and will dare to be sure that in this way we will not retract, but advance, not go backward, but forward!

B'nai B'rith of Chicago

Oriental-Hillel Lodge.

Despite the inclement weather, an unusually large attendance was present at the meeting of the Oriental-Hillel Lodge, No. 72, held in the Covenant Club on Tuesday, May 22, 1917. A class of twenty candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

The special feature of the evening was an address by Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Director of the Social Service Department of the Order on the subject, "Need We Apologize"? The address met with much approval and at its conclusion a rising vote of thanks was tendered to the speaker.

After the close of the meeting, refreshments and cigars were served and a social hour was spent.

David Fish Lodge.

An unusually well attended meeting of David Fish Lodge, No. 130, was held at the Covenant Club on May 21, 1917. Despite the inclement weather, more than 100 members were in attendance and a class of nine candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge. A number of new applications were presented and it is expected that before the Annual Convention of the Grand Lodge, an additional class will be initiated. The special feature of the evening was a lecture by Mr. John D. Shoop, Superintendent of the Chicago Public School System on the subject of "Education and Life." The address was received with much applause and at its conclusion a rising vote of thanks was tendered the speaker. Preceding the meeting of the lodge, a special committee consisting of the officers of the lodge entertained Mr. Shoop at a dinner at the Covenant Club.

Ramah Lodge.

The meeting of Ramah Lodge, No. 33, held at the premises of the Covenant Club, on Thursday evening, May 17, 1917, was the first B'nai B'rith gathering held at the Club premises and was utilized as a dedicatory occasion of the Covenant Club for B'nai B'rith purposes. Rev. Dr. Julius Rappaport of Chicago invoked God's blessing upon the Covenant Club and dedicated it as a place for the practice of the high aims of the Order.

A class of 53 candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge and a large number of new applications were presented. During the recess in the evening, subscriptions to the National Red Cross were gathered and more than one hundred members voluntarily responded to the call and enrolled themselves as members of the Red Cross.

The lodge also resolved to invest $1000 of its reserve fund in United States Liberty Bonds and the trustees were directed to carry this resolution into immediate execution.

The most important feature of the meeting was an address delivered by Bro. Dr. Julius Rappaport on the subject "The Jewish Conception of Life." A large number of visiting brethren from the two sister lodges in the city were present, and in all over five hundred members of the lodge and the Order attended. At the close of the meeting supper was served to all the members and visiting brethren in the adjoining hall, and the Club premises were thrown open for the accommodation and comfort of all those who desired to avail themselves of this privilege.

Chicago Social Service Committee.

The regular monthly meeting of the Social Service Committee was held on Saturday afternoon, June 2nd, at the Covenant Club. The special feature of the meeting was the consideration of reports of the committees on the Hebrew Christian Missions and the Boys' Brotherhood Republic. In addition to this, the delegates to the Big Brother Conference held at Grand Rapids submitted their reports.

Chicago Social Service Department.

The report of the Social Service Committee covering a period of six months indicates considerable progress in the work of preventing delinquency among our Jewish boys. Over one hundred boys have been assisted through the office in meeting members of our Order who have volunteered to act as Big Brothers to such boys. These boys come from homes where the conditions are not favorable for their normal development. In some cases the boys have no parents living, or only one parent living; in others, the boy's parents are divorced; in still others, the parents are the recipients of charity. The Big Brother in each case endeavors to aid the boy in securing suitable employment, enrolls the boy in night school, helps him to start a savings account and urges him to attend Synagogue and Sabbath School.

The Social Service Committee is also interesting itself in organizing boys' clubs in those districts of the city from which most of our delinquents come. Plans are being made for conducting vocational guidance classes and classes in civics. The committee is also making a study of the Hebrew Christian Missions operating in the densely populated Jewish sections.

Covenant Club.

The Covenant Club of Chicago was informally opened for business on Monday, May 14, 1917. The Club is located at 14 N. Dearborn Street, occupies two top floors of the building, being located on the corner having a street frontage of 100 feet on Dearborn Street. In all, the Club premises occupies approximately 17,000 square feet. The Board of Directors have expended nearly $32,000 in remodeling the floors to suit the purposes of the Club and in properly equipping and furnishing the same. The accommodations at the Club are the following: Dining room, ball room, gymnasium with rest room and shower baths, library and reading room, amusement rooms, ladies' parlor and rest rooms. The privileges of the Club are restricted to the members of the Club only, and its membership is restricted to members of the Order. Up to the present time over 500 members have joined the Club, and the membership is composed of some of the best and most representative element in Chicago Jewry.

The Covenant Club has tendered its premises to the Rabbinical Association of Chicago and its weekly meetings are held there. The Association of Jewish Sabbath School Teachers have also been granted the privilege of holding their regular meetings. It is the aim of the Board of Directors to make the Covenant Club a rallying place and center for Jewish and B'nai B'rith activities. In addition to the B'nai B'rith lodges holding their regular meetings there, the following B'nai B'rith organizations are making the Covenant Club their headquarters: The Executive Committee of the Order, The General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 6, Anti-Defamation League, Chicago B'nai B'rith Social Service Department, the B'nai B'rith Cemetery Association, and the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago. The Club premises are open daily from 10 a.m. until 12 midnight.

Chicago B'nai B'rith Establishes Summer Camp for Jewish Boys.

The Central B'nai B'rith Council has completed arrangements for the establishment of a boys' summer camp to be located at Long Lake, Ill. Accommodations will be provided for over 300 Jewish boys who would not otherwise be in a position to avail themselves of the opportunity to secure an outdoor vacation. A kosher kitchen will be maintained.

The camp will open about July first and will continue on until the opening of school in the fall. Fees will be nominal, so that no boy will be barred from the advantages of the camp. Each boy will be given a vacation of two weeks.

The camp will be under the supervision of an expert director and a corps of assistants. Arrangements have been made for each boy to be taught swimming and first aid. A number of the members of our Order, particularly those who are active in the Big Brother work, have volunteered to visit the camp and help entertain the boys.

Should this summer's experiment prove successful, it is the intention of the Central Council to take over the entire supervision of this camp as a permanent B'nai B'rith activity.

BARZILLAI LODGE, LAFAYETTE, INDIANA.

The last two dances of the lodge, the Purim costume dance of March 7th and the last one of this season on April 20th, were a great success. The attendances were splendid; equally well, the spirit of sociability. The arrangement committee consisted of Messrs. Levi Oppenheimer, Ernest Urwiszt and Bob Zimmerman, to whom much credit is due for their earnest and successful efforts.

The following won prizes at the costume dance: Messrs. Monroe Truman and Ed. H. Pottlitzer for the most grotesque, and Miss Dorothy Rice for the most artistic costumes. Mr. and Mrs. Urwitz also won prizes for the best dancing.

About twenty-five new members were also initiated during the last two months, making the present membership about sixty-five.

The lodge is indeed to be commended for its fine awakening and active labors this year.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND.

The attendance prize donated by Bro. A. Boskowitz was won by Bro. I. E. Hervin. The meeting was largely attended and was started with the roll call of members.

A largely attended meeting of Theo. Herzl Lodge, No. 314, was held on Tuesday evening, May 22, 1917. Seventeen applications for membership were presented. Mr. G. L. McDonald, ex-superintendent of the Oregon State Penitentiary, gave an interesting talk on conditions in the penitentiary, showing the necessity of rebuilding the reformatory.

The Youths' Auxiliary of the B'nai B'rith gave a dance on Thursday evening, June 7th, at the B'nai B'rith Building, which proved a most enjoyable event.

Anniversary Celebration of Portland Lodge.

The twenty-sixth anniversary of Portland Lodge, No. 416, was celebrated on May 15 by the Jewish community of Portland at the B'nai B'rith Building. Hundreds participated in the fete, which was a decided financial and social success, about $600 being realized. The scene presented was one of color and life and money was spent freely at all of the booths. Raffles, flower, ice cream, notion, fortune-telling, fruit, flag, candy and cake booths, Kangaroo Court and jitney dance, country store, all conspired to assist the guest in disposing of available funds. Assisting Portland Lodge were Theodor Herzl Lodge, No. 314, Oregon and Jacob Bloch auxiliaries, Daughters of the Covenant, and the Council of Jewish Women. Much credit is due the members of the committee in charge. The proceeds will be put into a fund for the relief of dependents of those in the army and navy.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY MISHAN LODGE NO. 247, I. O. B. B.

Whereas, Our beloved country, the United States of America, is now at war, fighting with the democracies of the world for the triumph of freedom and justice, in defense of the rights of its citizens and for the protection of the rights of humanity, and,

Whereas, Throughout the many centuries in his history, the Jew at all times, has evinced a rare, unequal spirit of constancy, devotion and patriotism to the land in which he was found and was ready to die for the honor of the Jewish name and for the principles of justice and democracy, and,

Whereas, The heroism, the bravery of the Jews who are serving this day in all the armies, the old Maccabean thrill of heroes' ardor, valor and sacrifice has been proved afresh, and,

Whereas, America is calling all those who enjoy her priceless prerogative of citizenship, to rally to her defense, and,

Whereas, This duty, this proud privilege falls especially on the sons of the Jewish race who in America—almost alone in the world——have found liberty, equality and fraternity, and,

Whereas, In prompt response to this call of America among our many Jewish Brethren who are volunteering in more than their due proportion, are some of our Brethren of Mishan Lodge, No. 247, I. O. B. B., who have actively enlisted their services and the services of their sons, in the cause of our country and humanity.

Be It Therefore Resolved: That we Members of Mishan Lodge, No. 247, I. O. B. B. at a social evening tenders in honor of our Brethren who have enlisted, express our profound gratification and rejoicing that we have in our midst such men who together with the rest of their brethren in America are testifying their superdevotion to the Republic that spreads its wings over us, and

Be It Further Resolved, That we both individually and as a body indulge the sincere hope that God will soon bring on the great day when, after the clouds of war shall have passed away forever, our Brethren will be with us again, while we daily pray to the God of the spirits of all flesh to hasten his salvation and to speed the day for an honorable, blessed and lasting peace to the world and

Be It Further Resolved, That the Secretary of this Lodge be instructed to spread these resolutions on the record book of the Lodge, that copies of same be sent to the homes of enlisted brethren and to the B'nai B'rith News.

CONSOLIDATION OF NEBRASKA AND WM. M'KINLEY LODGES OF OMAHA.

After many years with two lodges in its midst Omaha awoke to the theory of consolidation and today has the largest lodge in the district outside of Chicago.

After months of negotiation a committee composed of members of William McKinley lodge and Nebraska lodge formulated a plan of consolidation and on Sunday, June 3rd the formal ceremonies took place.

The occasion was graced by the presence of A. B. Seelenfreund, secretary of the Order. Hiram D. Frankel, second vice-president, and Gustavus Loevinger, chairman of Propaganda Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 6.

These guests arrived shortly before noon on Sunday and were met by fifty representatives of the Omaha lodges. A parade of twenty autos was formed at the depot and followed a route through the residence districts and along the boulevards of Omaha.

After a short informal reception to the visitors a hundred members sat down to an informal luncheon with the guests in the grill room of the Hotel Fontenelle. From here the party adjourned to Crounse Hall which, though the largest lodge hall in the city, was too small to hold the crowd. Over 350 members of the order watched a class of over 65 candidates receive the degree after Bro. Seelenfreund had presided in the meeting which formally made one big lodge of the two old ones.

The degree work was put on by McKinley lodge and finer work is rarely to be seen or heard anywhere.

A spirited contest for officers of the new organization brought out only the most harmonious feeling, for when it was all over victor and vanquished for each office pledged anew their undivided support to the Order and the lodge.

The meeting was one of the livest and most inspiring ever held by a lodge outside of the city of Chicago. Enthusiasm was at highest pitch and the new lodge started its official life with wonderful prospects.

Too much praise cannot be bestowed [illegible] the workers of Omaha who gave [illegible] their time and energy for [illegible]ass for members and to effect a [illegible]lidation. In less than a year this set of workers increased the membership in Omaha until from 260 members the new lodge now will have a membership of over 500 and more are still coming in.

To pick out any one or half a dozen men would be to do an injustice to the many who worked so hard to effect the fine result of Sunday.

Bro. Seelenfreund delivered an inspiring address to the members and the initiates and at its close appointed Bro. Isadore Zeigler, a former member of the general committee, to act as monitor during the ensuing term.

Bro. Seelenfreund left for Chicago at six o'clock but Bros. Loevinger and Frankel remained over until midnight and addressed a temple meeting in the evening. The beautiful temple was filled to the doors and listened to three splendid addresses by Bros. Monsky, Loevinger and Frankel. Bro. Monsky expounded the work of the Order, Bro. Loevinger spoke on "The Perpetua Jew" and Bro. Frankel on "The Spirit of Giving"

Altogether the day was a memorable one and the results will be of everlasting benefit to the district and the order.

CINCINNATI LODGE HOLDS PATRIOTS' NIGHT.

Patriots' night, Monday, May 14, at the Rockdale Auditorium, was the most unique and successful meeting ever held by the local B'nai B'rith lodge. Following a short business session, Chairman Victor Abraham, past president of the lodge announced the arrival of four military officers who appeared in uniform. Inspiring patriotic addresses and appropriate music aroused the enthusiastic hearers. The auditorium was elaborately decorated with the national colors. Applause after applause interrupted the speakers, who were as follows: Captain Royal Mattice, adjutant First Regiment, Ohio National Guard, his topic being, "Patriotism in the Individual" followed by Major Frank W. Hendley of the Medical Reserve Corps who spoke on "Experiences on the Mexican Border".

Rev. Dr David Philipson closed the meeting with a most eloquent address entitled, "The American Jew" in which he recalled the bravery of Jews in both the Revolutionary and Civil War. Altogether it was the most enjoyable and most inspiring meeting of the entire year as was attested by the enthusiasm and hearty approval of the large attendance.

Sioux City Lodge No. 598 was installed at Sioux City, Ia., Wednesday evening, June 6th, with a charter enrollment of nearly 100 members.

Bro. Hiram D. Frankel of St. Paul, Minn., first vice-president of the district, acted as installing officer.

The members who had signed the petition met at Hebrew Institute at 7:30 and formally signed the charter roll of membership. Then Bro. Frankel presided at an informal organization and election and later this informal organization was made permanent.

The degree team from Omaha and half a dozen other brothers from that city and Council Bluffs braved unusual weather conditions and made the hundred mile trip to help make the occasion long to be remembered in Sioux City.

The team put on the degree work in splendid style. The team deserves especial praise as it sacrificed its time in coming to Sioux City after the same men had spent weeks in effecting a consolidation of the two Omaha lodges and in securing a class of members.

Sioux City lodge was pledged the earnest support of the older members and also of all the prominent Jewish citizens of the city. Scarcely ever has such enthusiasm and fraternal spirit been exhibited as that shown by the Jews of this splendid metropolis of the west.

Following the formal installation the vice-president of the district presented the lodge with its charter and also formally presented to President Harry Lapidus the charter of the newly installed Omaha lodge.

Bro. Henry Monsky delivered an address to an open meeting that tested the capacity of the Hebrew Institute and was followed by Bro. Frankel, who spoke on "Israel, the Miracle of the Back Door". The meeting was one of the most enthusiastic of any ever held by the Jewish people of Sioux City.

Rabbi Sternheim closed both the formal lodge meeting and the public session with a fervent prayer.

The officers of Sioux City lodge are all well known and ardent young men of influence in the community. They have all pledged to President Baron their earnest support and undoubtedly before the year is over this lodge will show another fifty per cent gain in membership.

The following officers were elected:

Edward E. Baron, president.
Sidney Major, vice-president.
William C. Slotsky, secretary.
Phil Goldblatt, treasurer.
A. L. Galinsky, monitor.
Will Baron, assistant monitor.
Morris D. Slatnick, warden.
Sovel Krueger, guardian.
Max Brodkey, Max Pill, Rabbi Emanuel Sternheim, Harold Levinger, J. B. Courshon and J. H. Levin, trustees.

The following was the committee of arrangements: Bros. Dr. Harry G. Goldman, chairman; Myer L. Victorius, Chas. J. Katzenstein, William Asher and Clarence G. Bachrach.

President Rosenzweig, among other things, said:

"The roll has been called, but from human lips no human answer comes. We cannot touch the hand that has vanished, or hear the voice that is stilled. But in our hearts and minds responsive echoes sound and memory call to reality things that were and lives that quickened responsive to ours; sympathies and aspirations that blended and welded with our very own selves. And so we are here tonight, bound by a fellowship of sweet memories of those that were, as well as held by the strong bond of a living purpose to bring to fruition the ideals which the dead held so dear, and the efforts to achieve which impelled them to become members of our glorious brotherhood.

This beautiful Jewish custom of yearly remembering the dead, it is our intention to make an annual institution of this Order. It should be so. Nothing in man's evolution is fraught with so much of idealism, is so productive of high purpose as this ceremonial:

"How pure at heart and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold,
Should be the man whose thought would hold
An hour's communion with the dead."

And as to our honored dead, those whom we so loved, those upon whom we look back with such pure, such hallowed, such mellowed thoughts and recollections, we can but

"Trust that those we call the dead
Are breathers of an ampler day for Ever nobler ends."

And it is for us, the living, to highly resolve to tread the destined path of man and do the work allotted to us, to make if possible but one step forward in the great cycle of events sustained by our faith in—

"That God which ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one clement
And one far off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves."

McKEESPORT LODGE, McKEESPORT, PA.

The annual outing of McKeesport Lodge, No. 573, to the children of the various Hebrew schools of the city, will be held at Olympia Park on Thursday, June 28, and promises to exceed any that has ever been given by this organization. In addition to the children of the city those of Glassport will be on hand to add to the merriment of the occasion.

Special arrangements have been made with the West Penn Traction Company for the transportation of the large crowd and the various athletic events and other interesting features for the day's outing, which have been arranged by the committee in charge, show that not only has care been taken of the youngsters, but also some attention has been given to the grown-ups. The athletic events and the baseball game will be in charge of Armin H. Friedman and Ben Itskovitz.

In the evening, the annual summer dance given by the lodge will be held.

The committee in charge consists of Morris Krow, chairman; Henry Flaster, William Weill, Ike Brown, Thomas Amper, Ben Itskovitz, Dr. J. A. Arnovitz, A. A. Raden and Charles Weisenthal.

PRESIDENT EDWIN L. LEVY PAYS OFFICIAL VISIT TO RIMMON LODGE, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

Mr. E. L. Levy of Richmond, Virginia, president of District Grand Lodge No. 5, paid an official visit on May 27, 1917, to Rimmon Lodge No. 68 at an open meeting held in the temple. After addresses by several members of the order, refreshments were served. Music was furnished by Miss Bettie Gellman, Miss Pauline Ehrstein and Miss Esther Ehrstein.

Charles Hutzler, president of Rimmon Lodge, presided at the meeting and made an address dealing largely with the history of the order. Rimmon Lodge had furnished the district grand lodge with six presidents, he said, more than any other single lodge. The Richmond men who have served as president, in addition to Mr. Levy, are M. L. Straus, Julius Straus, William Lovenstein, Henry S. Hutzler and Harold Bloomberg.

It is the function of B'nai B'rith to bring together all factions and branches of Jews as a unit to carry on philanthropic work, said Mr. Levy in his address. The main features of the order's activity have been in social service, especially for the uplifting of boys and in suppressing defamation of the Jewish race, as such. Mr. Levy called attention also to the fact that the ritual of the order places emphasis on patriotism.

Aubrey H. Straus, professor of bacteriology in the Medical College of Virginia, delivered an address on "The Shortage of Physicians." Contrary to the prevalent opinion, he said, there were not enough physicians in the United States to meet the needs of the country. As a result of increased severity of the requirements for the study and practice of medicine in the effort to obtain better doctors if fewer, the number of medical colleges has decreased in the last twelve years from 166 to 95 and the average number of students in the individual colleges also has fallen off.

"Probably 20 per cent of the physicians in the United States will be required for active service in the army and navy before the end of the present war", Mr. Straus declared. "Richmond may be able to do without 20 per cent of her physicians, but the rural districts cannot."

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

Before an audience that practically filled the Duchess Theater, the Dramatic Association of the B'nai B'rith presented an original drama, "Children of Today," on May 20.

The performance was a smooth one. The various members of the cast performed their parts in excellent fashion. The play, which was written especially for the Dramatic Association by Mr. Albert Koblitz, was a three-act drama. Mr. Koblitz had his theme well in hand, and the audience's interest was held until the final curtain.

The musical program was in charge of Louis Rich and his orchestra, which performed up to its usual high standard.

Entire proceeds will be devoted to the Jewish War Sufferers' Fund.

The Junior B'nai B'rith outing this summer will be held at Willough Beach on Sunday, June 10. The entertainment committee assures that the program for this affair will surpass any previous attempt. Plenty of action, enough to keep the members occupied all day, is promised.

At a well attended meeting of Cleveland Lodge held on May 6th at the B'nai B'rith building, a large class was initiated. This was the final initiation of the season.

At the meeting of the Speakers' Club of the B'nai B'rith, held on Sunday, April 29th, Dr. Zeligson addressed the audience on the proposed billion dollar gift to France, and of our relations with that country.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith Speakers' Club held an open meeting at the B'nai B'rith building on Sunday, May 27th. The following members participated in the public discussion: Messrs. S. J. Friedman, J. Denbe, P. Mereine, H. Grundstein, E. Wolf and H. Mereine.

Bro. Alfred A. Benesch presided at the oratorical contest in which Jewish young people's organizations competed for three medals, gold, silver and bronze, donated by Mr. B. B. Given. The contest was held on June 2nd at the B'nai B'rith building and was in charge and under the auspices of the Junior B'nai B'rith. The following organizations competed: Euclid Avenue Temple Alumni, the B'nai B'rith Jeshurim Temple Alumni, the Hiram House, the Council Education Alliance, the Western Reserve Menorah Society, the Junior B'nai B'rith and the Speakers' Club of B'nai B'rith.

SIOUX CITY ORGANIZES NEW LODGE.

On Sunday evening, May 6th, Sioux City again entered the ranks of B'nai B'rith communities. Interest in the former lodge had greatly dwindled, but thanks to the energy of Gustavus Loevinger, chairman of the Propaganda Committee in District No. 6 and Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee of Chicago, Social Service Director, a fine spirit of enthusiasm was awakened which augurs well for the new lodge.

On Friday morning, Bros. Loevinger and Coffee reached Sioux City and undertook propaganda work. It soon developed that conditions were ripe and that with proper encouragement, a lodge could speedily be organized. On Friday eening, Dr. Coffee occupied the pulpit of Dr. Emanuel Sternheim, and in the course of his sermon on "Religion Tomorrow", emphasized the great part which the B'nai B'rith would play in shaping the future destinies of Judaism in America. Sunday morning Doctor Coffee again occupied the pulpit and took a second occasion to emphasize the growing influence of our Order. Meanwhile, Bro. Loevinger had put himself in touch with leading members of the community and practically everyon pledged his power and strength.

Sunday evening, in the quarters of the Hebrew Alliance, a very large gathering of men and women was present to hear the two visitors. The meeting was opened by Rabbi Emanuel Sternheim, who turned the gavel over to Brother Loevinger. The remarks of Bro. Loevinger left the deepest impression on all his hearers. They all felt the inspiration of a busy lawyer giving up three days of his time to bear the message of altruism and genuine religion. He called upon the men of the assembly to organize a lodge at once. Sioux City is one of the largest communities in America with no B'nai B'rith organization and this should not be.

After a few musical numbers, Dr. Coffee was introduced and chose as his theme, "The World's Greatest War". If the average person were asked, he would reply that the world's greatest war is now being waged in Europe. We Jews, however, are interested, not so much in the terrible massacre of soldiers and innocent bystanders for now almost three years, as we are concerned with the war to abolish poverty. Judaism wages war on sin and disease, on ignorance and starvation. When Abraham was commanded to be a blessing, the divine word urged him to spread the gospel of light to all inhabitants of the world. Moses continued this great mission and today we Jews must bear the unfinished burden of our great leaders. Only through such service and this is Social Service, can the Jew hope for a blessed haven in this country. His wealth will not save the Jew from persecution. Social standing may protect certain individuals for a time, but we must all labor to aid our three million Jewish people in America to economic independence and to serve America's interests. Jews as attorneys living up to the highest ideals of their professions, as doctors enriching the science of medicine through new discoveries in the laboratory and thus prolonging the span of life, social workers aiding worthy poor people to help themselves, represent types of Jews who enrich the land wherein we live.

At the conclusion of Dr. Coffee's remarks, members of the Sioux City community delivered brief addresses, all pledging their earnest efforts to the new organization. Among those who spoke were Messrs. Edward E. Baron, Dave Davidson, Max Pill, Sidney Major and Phil Goldblatt.

The meeting closed with well chosen words by Rabbi Emanuel Sternheim, who felt sure that the lodge, commenced under such inspiring speeches, would be a credit, not only to the Jews of Sioux City, but to the Order at large.

MEMORIAL SERVICE BY BRADDOCK LODGE.

Braddock Lodge No. 516 of Braddock, Pa., held memorial services at the Maccabee Hall on the afternoon of May 30. Mr. Allen Davis of Pittsburgh was the principal speaker. Mr. A. L. Lipsky presided and brief speeches were made by Mr. M. Friedman of McKeesport, who presented a large portrait of Dr. J. Leonard Levy, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Steinitz of Braddock, to the lodge, and L. Sulzbacher, the secretary of the Grand Lodge. Mr. Davis' address was a tribute to the memory of Rabbi Levy.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Ophir Auxiliary, No. 5, Daughters of the Covenant, held a successful dance at the B'nai B'rith Building, on May 20, 1917, for the benefit of the Red Cross. A large crowd was present and a neat sum was turned over to the Red Cross Society.

JULIUS HOUSEMAN LODGE, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

Julius Houseman Lodge No. 238 of Grand Rapids, Michigan, held an open meeting on Monday evening, May 21st, which was very largely attended. The speaker of the evening was Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, Chicago, Social Service Director of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, who had come to Grand Rapids to address the meeting.

On Sunday morning Doctor Coffee had occupied the pulpit of Rabbi Charles J. Freund and spoke on "The War Against War", emphasizing the social service angle which is becoming increasingly important.

On Monday noon, in the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce, Doctor Coffee addressed a very well attended meeting of Grand Rapids leading citizens and told of the fine work which the Big Brother Movement is accomplishing among the Jewish lads of Chicago. In the evening, Doctor Coffee spoke in the Temple. The meeting was called to order by Brother Theodore Collat, president of the lodge, who in turn presented Brother Adolph Friedman as chairman of the evening. After a very carefully prepared speech, which was delivered with the utmost feeling and earnestness, the social service director was introduced. Doctor Coffee's theme was: "Judaism and Social Service" He showed its outstanding emphasis as revealed through the pages of Holy Writ. He analyzed its strong position in the Talmud and during the Middle Ages. Today, as never before, the Jews of America are entering, as they should enter, social service activities. The B'nai B'rith takes this up, not on a purely secular basis, but through the religious angle. Our example should hearten our American neighbors so that they fight the slums, the unsanitary tenement and preventable diseases. Ours is a religion of deed which places the utmost emphasis on human conduct. Let our order become the Big Brother to the Jews of Grand Rapids, even as individual members are taking care of Little Brothers. As our organization is a Big Brother to the Jews of America, so let the Jews of America act as Big Brother to all the citizens of this land. Then America will set a shining example for democracy and for real brotherhood for all the people in the world.

NEW KENSINGTON, PA.

New Kensington Lodge No. 762 of New Kensington, Pa., held an open meeting on Sunday afternoon, May 13th at the Odd Fellows Hall. Installation of officers and initiation of a class of candidates took place.

The principal speakers were Brother Marcus Feuchtwanger of New Castle, first vice-president of the District Grand Lodge, Mr. Adolph Edlis of Pittsburgh, and A. H. Friedman of McKeesport, members of the General Committee. At the conclusion of the meeting refreshments were served.

Anniversary Celebration.

On Sunday, May 13th, New Kensington Lodge No. 762, I. O. B. B., celebrated its re-birth in a very commendable manner which will long live in the minds of the many participants.

Mr. Marcus Feuchtwanger, vice-president of the district, had full charge of the meeting and was assisted by several officers of the grand lodge of District No. 3.

The exercises consisted of installation of officers, initiation of 15 new recruits into membership, followed by splendid expressions by many of those who were fortunate to have been present.

The Jews of New Kensington are entitled to much praise for the very generous spirit evinced in anything tending to the betterment of our people, and President Feuchtwanger looks forward to great achievements by the lodge that has been re-created.

Recent developments in Jewry have had a good effect upon all lodges throughout the district, and has a tendency to greatly increase the membership in nearly every lodge.

FLATBUSH, N. Y.

Flatbush Lodge No. 753, held an open meeting, May 16th, which was addressed by Bro. Isidor Hirschfeld of Manhattan Lodge. It will be recalled that Brother Hirschfeld spent seven months in the European War zone and successfully accomplished the task of establishing the means of postal communication between our coreligionists in the war zone and relatives and friends in this country. Hirschfeld's task was exceedingly interesting and was very much appreciated. The president of the lodge, Bro. Clarence G. Bachrach, with the assistance of Bro. Paul Gold, the secretary, have such open meetings quite frequently, so as to familiarize the general public with the aims of the Order and Jewish activities generally.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Under the auspices of Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 of San Francisco, a lecture was given at a well attended meeting held on May 2, 1917, by Brother Nathan Newmark on "The Modern Emancipation of the Jew". Bro. Newmark also addressed the lodge at its previous meeting on the "Peoples of Babylonia and Assyria" and his learned discourse proved a delightful surprise to the members. His observations on the peoples who formerly inhabited these lands are an inspiration to any student of history.

Golden Gate lodge in a body visited Ophir Lodge No. 21 of San Francisco on April 18 and were greeted by a regular talk-fest. Addresses were made by the Secretary of the Grand Lodge, I. J. Aschheim, the Junior Past Grand President, Henry Newburgh and Brother I. Stein.

At the close of the meeting the members were feasted liberally with eatables and a social hour was spent.

Golden Gate Lodge is now publishing its official organ, "The Golden Echo" and the numbers so far issued were of exceptional merit.

The lodge gave a whist party on April 4 which proved attractive to a great many and which was graced by the presence of a large number of ladies.

The coming term promises to be a banner year for the Committee of Fifty representing the San Francisco lodges. An elaborate program of events has been outlined and many affairs of interest will be gien during the term. Among the most important arrangements are a ball at the St. Francis Hotel, a "Kiddie's Day", an entertainment for the inmates of the Home for the Aged and a picnic, all of which have met with great success in previous years. The first event was an informal dance on April 25 and the large attendance present enjoyed themselves immensely.

Ophir Auxiliary of San Francisco gave a dance for the benefit of the American Red Cross on May 16, 1917.

At the meeting of Cremieux Lodge No. 325 held on May 28, 1917, Dr. Goldman made an interesting address on "Social Hygiene."

Under the auspices of the Social Committee of Cremieux Lodge a successful dance was held on Saturday evening, April 29.

The ten B'nai B'rith lodges of San Francisco have responded enthusiastically to the plans of the Membership Committee.

Prospective candidates, recommended for membership by various members of the lodges, are being visited and initiations are being planned.

Throughout the local lodges a strong spirit of co-operation with the Membership Committee is being manifested, and several of the lodges have launched membership campaigns of their own.

Within the past fortnight three San Francisco lodges have held class initiations and other lodges will follow shortly.

Modin, California and Columbia lodges have held class initiations during the past two weeks, their rolls being swelled with enthusiastic new members.

The ritualistic work in each instance was performed by the crack degree team of the Committee of Fifty, which is holding itself in readiness to carry on the initiatory work incident to increasing membership.

At the request of the chairman of the Membership Committee, each lodge is appointing a sub-committee of five on membership. These committees will meet jointly once a month to discuss ways and means of co-operation in the work at hand.

A monster rally is being planned for the near future.

An interesting lecture entitled "Hawaii," accompanied by steropticon views, was delivered to the members and friends of the Leo N. Levi Youths' Auxiliary, I. O. B. B., on Monday evening by Henry Hart.

Mr. Hart told of his experience in the islands, also of the people and their customs. The scenes shown were made from photographs taken by Mr. Hart himself.
